WARD, LOCK & CO.'S LIST.

Messrs. WARD, LOCK & CO. beg to announce

A New and Handsome Library Edition of THE NOVELS OF G. J. WHYTE-MELVILLE

"THE NOVELIST, THE VATES SACER, OF FIELD SPORTS AND LONDON SOCIETY."—Athenæum.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each Volume.

The late G. J. Whyte-Melville, uniting, as he did, the qualities of poet, novelist, sportsman, and leader of society, has long been acknowledged to stand above rivalry when dealing with sport and the romance of old. Although the sale of his works has always been large, the publishers feel that the time has now arrived to issue an edition more worthy of his fame, and have therefore pleasure in announcing a monthly issue of his novels. Each volume will be illustrated by front-rank artists.

"WHYTE-MELVILLE'S charming novels,—It does one a world of good to read anything written by Whyte-Melville, and for youth and the rising generation what can there be better? The new edition is a handsome volume in good bold type, and is beautifully illustrated."—Sporting Life.

This Series will be well printed from type specially cast, on Dickinson's best antique paper, and neatly and handsomely bound in cloth gilt, with design by A. A. Turbayne.

JUST READY.

KATERFELTO. Illustrated by Lucy E. Kemp-Welch.

"The story of 'Katerfelto' is already well known to many of my readers, but even those will be glad to have it in so beautiful an edition. Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.'s edition is a marvellous three-and-sixpence worth; well printed, well bound, and well illustrated. 'Katerfelto' is indeed a delightful romance."—Mr. CLYMENT K. SHORTER in the Sketch.

CERISE. Illustrated by G. P. Jacomb-Hood.

TO BE FOLLOWED AT INTERVALS BY—

SARCHEDON. Illustrated by S. E. Waller.

MARKET HARBOROUGH, and INSIDE the BAR.

IN HIS STEPS.

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO?

By CHAS. M. SHELDON.

This remarkable book has secured a Social and Religious Influence in America only previously equalled by such outstanding stories as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "Looking Backward." In the guise of a Dramatic Story the book makes a powerful appeal to the public conscience in the lines in which interest is now so deeply aroused—viz., the Social Conditions Affecting the Relations of Employer and Employee, Rich and Poor, the Christian and the World, &c.

IN HIS STEPS.

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO?

"An impressive and really remarkable book."—New Age.

"A thoroughly bright, interesting, and instructive story, with a deep religious trend pervading the whole. Its undoubted excellence should secure it a large circulation."—Teachers' Aid.

"Singulantly impressive It is a sermon in action, and one that cannot fail to touch the heart."—New York Christian Advocate.

READY AT ONCE.

A NEW BOOK BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Uniform with the above.—Wrapper, 6d.; cloth, 1s.

THE CRUCIFIXION OF PHILLIP STRONG.

"It is an argument, a plea, a panorama, and a story all in one. The story is one of intense vigour and pathos. It will secure a very wide reading, and it should make a deep impression upon every reader, and produce lasting fruit."—The Congregationalist.

Just Published.—An Entirely New Edition of

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES,

AND UNIVERSAL INFORMATION.

A COMPLETE RECORD OF ALL NATIONS AND TIMES.

With especial reference to the History and Achievements of the British Empire
Containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1898.

By BENJAMIN VINCENT,

Hon. Librarian of the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

Medium 8vo, cloth, 21s.; half-calf, 25s.; full or tree calf, 31s. 6d.

TWENTY-SECOND EDITION.

Revised, Corrected, and Enlarged with New and Important Matter, and thoroughly brought down to the Autumn of 1898.

Containing 1,290 pages, and considerably over 12,500
Articles, 145,000 Dates and Facts.

The Times says: "'Haydn's Dictionary of Dates' is the most universal Book of Reference in a moderate compass that we know of in the English language."

Prospectus and Specimen Page sent post free on application.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW SERIES OF

THREE-AND-SIXPENNY BOYS' BOOKS.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, illustrated by ADOLF THIEDE and others.

BY THE LATE J. G. EDGAR.

Mr. ALFRED NUTT, in the Bookman says: "J. G. Edgar is, in my opinion, far superior to any boys' writer of the present day."

CRESSY and POICTIERS: the Story of the Black Prince's Page.

Mr. CLYMENT K. SHORTER, in the Bookman, says: "A story with a thrill in every chapter.....Quite as good as the hundred and one adventure stories which now sell their ten or twenty thousand in six-shilling form."

RUNNYMEDE and LINCOLN FAIR: a Story of the Great Charter.

"An engrossing tale of the Great Charter. Every page, almost every line, glows with burning interest, and the boy who can pick up the book without wishing to read right through from start to finish will be dull of wit indeed."—Sun.

HOW I WON my SPURS; or, a Boy's Adventures in the Barons' Wars.

BY F. DAVENANT.

HUBERT ELLIS: a Story of the Days of King Richard the Second.

Prisons).

"It is no exaggeration to say that in the personal volume he has now given to the world there is not a dull page; and that among English ministerial memoirs the recollections of Dr. Newman Hall will occupy a high place, both on account of their literary form and of their many points of human interest."—LEEDS MERCURY.

AYLWIN.

BY

THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON,

Author of "The Coming of Love:
Rhona Boswell's Story."

Some Opinions of the American Press.

"One of the most original and sustained romances that have appeared in recent years.
It will be widely read, and will deserve all the attention that it will attract."

New York Times.

"A piece of imaginative work so original as almost to evade classification; a book to read with the closest care and to treasure for repeated reading in the future."

Dial (Chicago).

"It is certainly one of the great literary successes of the year."

The Commercial (Buffalo).

"Judged by the beauty of its style, its imaginative power, its sweep and intensity of vision, its spiritual outlook, it must be accorded high rank in the literature of today."—Indianapolis News (Chicago).

"It is of all novels the most thoroughly informed with a clear and candid passion.
It is already a classic, and nothing has given such encouragement to the lover of English art and letters as the popularity it seems bound to attend, so happy an example of all that is best within its power of attainment."

Evening Post (Chicago).

"An intensely dramatic story. A book to read and re-read; issued among books that are sure to find a place of their own."

Outlook (New York).

"It makes an extraordinary and lasting impression even on the blasé reader. Sinf Lovell is a splendid creation."

Transcript (Boston).

"The nobility of soul that lives in the proud Roman lass, Sinf Lovell, stamps itself ineffaceably upon the mind and heart of the reader as does that of Romola and Cordelia."

Telegraph (Philadelphia).

net, and in 3 vols., super-royal 8vo, 12s. net each.

* The Volumes are sold separately.

Times.—"The high quality of the work as a popular encyclopædia of ethnology and anthropology is attested by the reputation of Professor Ratzel and the authority of Dr. E. B. Tylor." Daily Chronicle.—"Fills a long-existing gap in the literature of the story of man and civilisation."
Guardian.—"Crammed with valuable information."

MACMILLAN'S NEW & RECENT NOVELS

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

The ADVENTURES of FRANCOIS,

Foundling, Thief, Juggler, and Fencing-Master
during the French Revolution. By S. WEIR MITCHELL, M.D., Author of "Hugh Wynne, Quaker."

* Upwards of 20,000 copies have been sold in this country and in America.

Literature.—"No novelist of whom we know, not even Felix Gras, has so vividly brought before us the life of lower Paris in the awful days of the Terror."

Speaker.—"That it is a fascinating tale is not to be denied.
... Francois is a delightful creation. ... There is plenty of adventure in the story."

Daily Chronicle.—"Dr. Weir Mitchell is certainly to be congratulated on the whole volume."

BISMILLAH. By A. J. Dawson.

Guardian.—"Decidedly clever and original."
Speaker.—"There is enough of exciting incident, of fighting, intrigue, and love-making in 'Bismillah' to satisfy the most exacting reader."
British Weekly.—"A well-told and exciting story."

HER MEMORY. By Maarten

MAARTENS.

Athenæum.—"Maarten Maartens has never written a brighter social story, and it has higher qualities than brightness."

Speaker.—"The eclectic taste will recognise in 'Her Memory' qualities of peculiar excellence, touches of absolute poetry, flashes of inimitable irony, swift similes sketched with a masterly hand, and an all-pervading flavour of that humanity which is the very essence of real literature."

St. James's Gazette.—"A delightful story.... Peculiarly fascinating.... Exquisitely told."

One Hundred and Twentieth Thousand.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE. By

JAMES LANE ALLEN, Author of "A Kentucky Cardinal."

St. James's Gazette.—"A book that should be read by all those who ask for something beside sensationalism in their fiction."

Spectator.—"Marked by beauty of conception, reticence of treatment, and it has an atmosphere all its own."

THE FOREST LOVERS: a

Romance. By MAURICE HEWLETT.
Literature.—"Enthralling.... We feel that for once a thorough success in literature has been achieved."

Daily News.—"A gay and gallant tale, abounding in surprises delicately devised and carried out with spirit and distinction."

The Literary Week.

NEXT week we shall announce the titles of the books published in 1898 which, in accordance with our annual custom, we shall crown with awards of One Hundred Guineas and Fifty Guineas.

THE critical conspiracy of which the British Weekly spoke so darkly a few weeks ago is still unmasked. Dr. Nicoll has been interviewed concerning his dire message, but beyond ominous hints, and "I could an' I would," and "A day will come," and other mysterious threats, he has divulged nothing. He writes thus in the current British Weekly: "I have been asked to give facts and names in connexion with the critical conspiracy of which I wrote some time ago. For the editors of the daily newspapers, with their yawning columns at this season, I have the deepest sympathy, and would gladly do what I could to help, but I cannot oblige them just now, and they must leave me to take my own time and my own way."

DR. NICOLL, however, goes on to say, that in supposing his reference was to the opponents of the Kailyard school, Mr. Lang was wrong. As for the attack which the Kailyarders have had to bear, "the results," says Dr. Nicoll, "have been of an awe-inspiring character. The sale of Mr. Crockett's books, I see, amounts now to the 'troifling mather,' as John Browdie would have called it, of 30,000 or 40,000 in this country." But Mr. Crockett is no Kailyarder in his romances. A better example might have been adduced.

THERE is now on sale in certain bookshops a guide to young authors by Sir Walter Besant, entitled The Pen and the Book. The work has not been fully published in the ordinary way, and no copies have been sent out for review, hence the young author is likely both to have difficulty in acquiring it and to lack the advantages which public criticism of a book often affords. It may be that Sir Walter Besant's manual is beyond cavil; yet so many commentators on his previous excursions into bookmaking statistics have had remarks to make, that this is perhaps too much to hope.

APROPPOS the article on John Stow which we published a fortnight ago, it is not a little curious (as a correspondent points out) that Stow's Survey completes the three hundredth year of its existence at the moment when the new Survey of London, upon which Sir Walter Besant and his assistants are so laboriously engaged, is about to be issued. We believe that the first volume of the new work will be seen in April. Another curious coincidence in connexion with a tercentenary occurs to us. On the 16th of this month Edmund Spenser will have been dead just 300 years, and it has taken just that length of time to obliterate the street (King-street, Westminster) in which the "poet's poet" drew his last breath.

It is interesting to notice that London has seldom been without an enthusiastic conservator of her traditions. In the seventeenth century there was Stow, followed by James Howel; in the eighteenth century Pennant, and also John Thomas Smith (whose pleasant Book for a Rainy Day ought to be reprinted with careful notes); while in our own century Knight, Thornbury, and Besant have "perambulated" London to good purpose. We observe that a magnificent "grangerised" edition of Pennant's Account of London, in six volumes, containing over 1,700 inserted illustrations, is now in the hands of Messrs. Robson, of Coventry-street. This work, which was constructed by Frederic, the third Earl of Bessborough, is priced at £300.

A NEW poem by Mr. Algernon Charles Swinburne will appear in the anniversary number of the Star on Monday, January 16.

IN another column we print the report of an interview which a representative of the ACADEMY has had with Messrs. Kelly, concerning the Post Office Directory, of which the 100th edition has just been issued. The oldest London Directory in the British Museum is dated 1736. It was published in Finch-lane, near the Royal Exchange, by Henry Kent, whose preface naïvely began: "The Difficulty which People are continually under, who have Business to transact, for Want of knowing where to find One Another, makes such a little Piece as this very Useful." We may add that its modern representative, Messrs. Kelly's "little Piece," weighs, by our office scales, eleven pounds, one ounce.

THE West End Review, hitherto a shilling monthly magazine, is about to be converted into a sixpenny weekly paper. "It is our aim," says the prospectus, "to give the public a paper better than any which they now know." And, "The best artists, the best writers, are on our staff." The conductors of the West End Review are intent upon making a very determined effort to win support. The date of the first issue of the new series is February 23.

A VERY interesting Christmas-card has been circulating among the admirers of R. L. S. in America, and a few copies have crossed the Atlantic. This consists of a photograph of the Stevenson memorial at San Francisco, with a passage from the "Christmas Sermon" printed below. We reproduce it for the benefit of Stevensoni-ans near and far.

THE STEVENSONIAN PORTSMOUTH SQUARE MONUMENT.

A Christmas Sermon.

TO BE HONEST, TO BE KIND—TO EARN A LITTLE, AND TO SPEND A LITTLE LESS, TO MAKE UPON THE WHOLE A FAMILY HAPPIER FOR HIS PRESENCE, TO RENOUNCE
WHEN THAT SHALL BE NECESSARY AND NOT BE EMBITTERED, TO KEEP A FEW FRIENDS, BUT THESE WITHOUT CAPITULATION—ABOVE
ALL, ON THE SAME GRIM CONDITION, TO KEEP FRIENDS WITH HIM-SELF—HERE IS A TASK FOR ALL THAT A MAN HAS OF FORTITUDE AND DELICACY.

It looks almost as if a real attempt to speak the truth about modern pantomime was upon us. In our own columns last week, "J. F. N." put the case against this debased form of entertainment with force and precision, and in Saturday's Chronicle Mr. A. B. Walkley took a similar view. But of what is worse than the tedious dulness of the modern pantomime—the horrid sophistication of the funny men and its total unfitness for children—nothing was urged by either critic. That seems to us the worst thing of all.

M. ZOLA, in his retirement in this country, has been learning English with the aid of the Vicar of Wakefield. M. Théodore Duret, one of his friends, supplied him with a copy having the French and English on opposite pages.

M. ZOLA'S publishers hope to issue his new book, Fécondité, in June of this year, but the Dreyfus case will control the exact time. All things considered, it would be unwise to publish any novel of M. Zola's before the fate of Dreyfus is settled. M. Zola is too much implicated to gain a fair hearing. But supposing Dreyfus's acquittal to be the result of the revision, M. Zola is likely to be the hero of France, and anything of his then appearing would have the most extraordinary welcome. For his Paris, for example, a sale of 120,000 copies was expected, but only 85,000 copies have been sold.

AFTER the splendid stand for justice made by the professors of France, it is lamentable to find as the founders of the new anti-Dreyfus "Ligue de la Patrie Française" M. Jules Lemaitre and M. François Coppée.

WEBSTER is prominent in the Nineteenth Century for this month. Miss Margaret Maitland has an interesting article on his "Vittoria Accoramboni," and Mr. Swinburne contributes a prologue to the "Duchess of Malfi." We quote some lines from this generous and warm-blooded tribute:

Half Shakespeare's glory, when his hand sublime
Bade all the change of tragic life and time
Live, and outlive all date of quick and dead,
Fell, rested, and shall rest on Webster's head

Deep down the midnight of the soul of sin
He lit the star of mercy throned therein.
High up the darkness of sublime despair
He set the sun of love to triumph there.
Things foul or frail his touch made strong and pure,
And bade things transient like to stars endure.
Terror, on wings whose flight made night in heaven,
Pity, with hands whence life took love for leaven,
Breathed round him music whence his mortal breath
Drew life that bade forgetfulness and death
Die: life that bids his light of fiery fame
Endure with England's, yea, with Shakespeare's name.

MR. TREE is to be congratulated on his reply to the critic who saw anachronism in the circumstance that Porthos, in "The Musketeers," smokes Latakia, that being a Turkish tobacco not introduced into England till a much later date. Says Mr. Tree, the latest of the Dumas commentators: "It has evidently escaped your erudite correspondent that in the course of the story of The Three Musketeers Porthos is for a long time lost sight of. What was he doing? Is it not reasonable to suppose that, like so many other soldiers of fortune of the period, he was wandering in foreign parts? During his travels he found himself in Turkey, where he contracted a taste for Iatakia, which never deserted him. This touch, I venture to think, is one that, though it may have escaped the unthinking minority of playgoers, is really only a proof of the unstinting care which has been taken to ensure accuracy of detail."

WITH this week's number the Spectator begins a new career as a stitched and cut periodical. Hitherto the paper-knife has been in severe requisition. As "S. G.," in the Pall Mall Gazette, says: "Happy indeed was the man who had his Spectator cut for him. Many of us less fortunate must have felt the ameliorating effect of its pages frequently counteracted, in railway carriages or elsewhere, by a temptation to profanity. The intricacy of its foldings recalled the many obstacles which beset the path of virtue: in future the road will be made easy, and we shall all grow virtuous."

THE same chronicler writes: "Chelsea is nothing if not proud of its literary associations. Rossetti gives his name to some red-brick mansions, and Carlyle stands godfather to one pier, one square, and half a dozen other entities. But the most surprising application of his name caught my eye in a local chemist's window, where there was a bottle labelled 'Carlyle Essence'; a couple of adjectives followed—'very pungent and penetrating,' I think." Another writer of literary notes has recently pointed out that Sydney is just now being mystified by a conjuror who has taken the name of Dante.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY's prose version of Omar Khayyám, which has just been published in a pocket edition by Mr. Nutt, has a pretty dedication "To Cecilia":

The Wine of Life, the Wonder of the Spring,
The passionate madness of the Nightingale
Whose Litany all lovers' lips must wail
"Farewell, farewell, farewell to everything"—
These Omar sang, and these myself shall sing
In dreams beside some stream where tulips sail,
Red Argosies, before the scented gale,
While you recline on Cæsar's dust and string
Your lute through all the languid afternoon
To Persian airs of Desert and of Palm,
Of green Oasis and of Gardens sweet
With roses, where the magic of the moon
In silver steeps the consecrated calm
And on the enchanted sward our shadows meet.

MR. G. W. STEEVENS is now in India, acting as special correspondent for the Daily Mail in connexion with Lord Curzon's instalment as Viceroy.

MR. H. G. WELLS's new story, When the Sleeper Wakes, begins in this week's Graphic.

MR. THOMAS HARDY, whose Wessex Poems will be reviewed in our columns next week, has his home in the heart of the country which serves as the background for all his books. His house, a photograph of which we reproduce, is at Max Gate, on the outskirts of the old-time town of Dorchester, which figures in several of his novels under the disguise of Casterbridge. From the upper windows of the house, which stands in its own grounds, there is an uninterrupted view to the rising ground both north and south. In the garden, at the end of the gravel path shown in our view, are some curious stones, presumably of the Druidical period, for which Mr. Hardy has an interested regard. In the porch is a door severe and plain enough to have belonged to the time when Judge Jeffreys was at Dorchester on his "Bloody Assize."

MR. HARDY, it will be noticed by readers of his poems, resorts now and then to Dorsetshire dialect. Another West Country dialect poet figures in the current Blackwood, in the person of Mr. Edward A. Irving, whose Devon song, "From Foreign Parts," has the true note of pathos and sincerity. It begins:

I was wanderin' dro' the thicket, hot and wet, and night a-comin':
All to once I yeard a cricket set to drummin', drummin', drummin'.
Her buzzed so gude and neighbourly I laughed aloud to hear,
I zinn'd 'twas engine dreshin' wheat to home in Devonsheer.

There us has no ice nor snow,
Like in jolly Devon.
Oh, to hear the cattle low,
Winter nights in Devon!
"Hark the herald angels sing"—
Mother with her Christmasing,
Boys all slidin' ring-a-ring
On our pond in Devon.

And this is the end:

Home-brew z'der soft as cream, blaze of ashen logs,
Our little maids like cherubim round the fire-dogs:
But hereaway—I could ha' cried, 'twas just a goin'
home,
I seed un so distirckly when I yead yon cricket drum.
Here there be no winter days,
Same as home to Devon.
Never see the wood-fire blaze
(Jolly land of Devon!).
Here the niggers call me "Zir"—
Oh, to be a laboure,
Pack ag's'n amid good cheer—
Back to jolly Devon!

We shall hope to hear from Mr. Irving's muse again.

In the same number of Blackwood Mr. W. Sichel writes entertainingly of the men who have kept a diary. His survey extends from Pepys to Grant Duff. "To 'men who have kept a diary,'" he says in conclusion, "we owe a deep debt of gratitude. They take us behind the scenes of character and achievement. They carry on the apostolic succession of experience. Pepys was the friend of Evelyn. Swift in his youth might have seen Evelyn in his age. Walpole in his boyhood might have beheld Swift. Walpole wrote for the Berrys. The Berrys lived to know both Johnson and Robinson. Grant-Duff records his meeting with the latter."

An opportunity for a champion of the pun has arisen. Writing in Pearson's Magazine, Mr. W. L. Alden is more severe upon the practice of punning than, we feel, a humorist ought to be. He says:

The essence of a pun consists in the resemblance in sound of one word to another. Why should a person be amused because a certain word sounds like a certain other word of a very different meaning? The answer to the conundrum, "When is a door not a door?" is a fair illustration of the pun in all its native idiocy. The answer of course is "When it's ajar," and the alleged joke of the answer consists in the fact that the word "ajar" sounds like the words "a jar." What is there in this resemblance in sound which is in the slightest degree funny?

If I were to say that a door is not a door when it is chopped up and burnt for firewood, my answer would be a comparatively sensible one, but people who regard the usual answer to the conundrum as amusing would rightly say that my answer was not at all funny. How this widespread delusion that there is humour or wit in the accidental resemblance of one word to another originated it is difficult to imagine.

But Mr. Alden does not put the case fairly. A pun is more than that. In citing the riddle of the door he has brought forward not a good pun, as he should have done, but a feeble pun. We are not, however, just now concerned to stand up for the pun; but we hope to see a reply to Mr. Alden.

MR. COLVIN'S selections from the letters of Robert Louis Stevenson begin in the current Scribner's. The first instalment is juvenile, and relates for the most part to early engineering excursions. He writes to his mother in 1868: "The Moonstone is frightfully interesting: isn't the detective prime?" And here is a good passage:

I stood a long while on the cope watching the sea below me; I hear its dull, monotonous roar at this moment below the shrieking of the wind; and there came ever recurring to my mind the verse I am so fond of:

But yet the Lord that is on high
Is more of might by far
Than noise of many waters is Or great sea-billows are.

Mr. Colvin remarks in his introduction: "Stevenson, in truth, never learnt to spell quite in a grown-up manner; and for this master of English letters a catarrh was apt to be a 'cattarrh,' and a neighbor a 'nieghbor,' and literature 'litterature,' to the end."

WHEN the Stock Exchange takes to literature the result is amusing, for though the form of humour most in vogue in "The House" is the practical joke, the written jest is by no means unattainable by the members. Some of them have just collaborated in producing a volume of articles and illustrations to be sold in aid of the Referee Children's Dinner Fund. The Referee being a sporting paper, the subject of "The House's" book is sport of all kinds; and as the Stock Exchange is the natural objective of illustrious athletes, there are here the opinions of some high authorities. In the cricket section we find a good story, contributed by Mr. C. C. Clarke, of a village cricketer who being asked, during a particularly healthy lunch, if he cared for the game as a game, replied, "Yes, sir, thank'ee. This is summat like; but what I don't like is the scouting out a'tween the meals."

FROM the week's dedications. Paul Sabatier's Life of St. Francis of Assisi (translated by L. S. Houghton):

TO THE STRASBURGIERS.

Friends!

At last here is this book which I told you about so long ago. The result is small indeed in relation to the endeavour, as I, alas! see better than anyone. The widow of the Gospel put only one mite into the alms-box of the temple, but this mite, they tell us, won her Paradise. Accept the mite that I offer you to-day as God accepted that of the poor woman, looking not at her offering, but at her love, Feci quod potui, omnia dedi.

Do not chide me too severely for this long delay, for you are somewhat its cause. Many times a day at Florence, at Assisi, at Rome, I have forgotten the document I had to study. Something in me seemed to have gone to flutter at your windows, and sometimes they opened. . . . One evening at St. Damian I forgot myself and remained long after sunset. An old monk came to warn me that the sanctuary was closed. "Per Bacco!" he gently murmured as he led me away, all ready to receive my confidence, "sognava d'amore o di tristitia?" Well, yes. I was dreaming of love and of sadness, for I was dreaming of Strashbourg.

LAURENCE STERNE^A is represented in the British Museum Autographs by a page of The Sentimental Journey. The lady mentioned is Eliza—Mrs. Eliza Draper—to whom he wrote: "I have brought your name Eliza! and picture into my work, where they will remain when you and I are at rest for ever. Some annotator or explainer of my works in this place will take occasion to speak of the friendship which subsisted so long and faithfully betwixt Yorick and the lady he speaks of." The date of the MS. from which our extract is taken is 1767.

I recall'd her looks at that crisis of our separation when neither of us had power to say. Adieu! I look'd at the Picture she had tied ~~bravely~~ in a black ribbon about my neck — & blush'd as I look'd at it — I would have given the world to have kiss'd it — but was ashamed. — and shall this tender flower, said I pressing it between my hands — shall it be smitten to its very root — & smitten Yorick! by thee who has promised to shelter it

PORTION OF THE MS. OF STERNE'S "SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY."

ELSEWHERE we give extracts from certain serious summaries of the literature of 1898. A would-be humorous article of a similar kind has appeared in the Daily Telegraph this week. This is the manner:

ON NOVELS.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's Helbeck of Bannisdale.—The subject had better not be mentioned to Roman Catholics.

Mr. George Moore's Evelyn Innes.—The subject had better not be mentioned to Puritans.

Mr. Henry James's The Two Magics.—The subject had better not be mentioned at all.

ON PHILOSOPHY.

Prof. William James's The Will to Believe.—Eclipse first and the rest nowhere.

Bad philosophies when they die go to Oxford or the Front Ministerial Bench.

ON POETRY AND POETS.

Mr. Thomas Hardy's Wessex Poems.—Nature said to Mr. Hardy: "You shall not be a poet"; Mr. Hardy answered: "I will."

M. ZOLA's story, La Fête à Coqueville, which was described by our Paris correspondent with so much spirit a few weeks ago, can, of course, be bought in London; and we mention the fact because it is pleasantly produced as a thin quarto in paper covers, and is illustrated by André Devambrez, whose drawings are delightful alike in humour and colour. The crazy old fishing village, the finding of the barrels of unknown liquor, and the ecstatic drunken enjoyment of their contents by the entire village, from the curé down, are rendered with infinite spirit.

MR. W. B. YEATS's forthcoming volume of poems is to bear the title, The Wind Among the Reeds. This is running Mrs. Hinkson's recent poetry book, The Wind Among the Trees, rather close.

MR. ALGERNON ASHTON's latest discovery is, so to speak, an accident. He fared to Hampstead Churchyard to test the inaccuracy of a report that Constable's grave was neglected; found it in good preservation; and was turning away, when a tomb in a state of serious decay caught his vigilant gaze. Closer examination proved it to be that of Joanna Baillie (1762-1851). Says Mr. Ashton: "Joanna Baillie was not only distinguished herself, but she also had very distinguished relatives: she was the niece of the great anatomists William and John Hunter, and sister of Matthew Baillie, likewise one of the greatest British physicians and anatomists. Are there, then, no living descendants of this illustrious family who will take the small trouble of restoring the tomb of Joanna Baillie?"

FROM Mr. Clement Scott's programme: "I myself shall endeavour to be accurate when, at the dawn of the New Year, if all be well, I sit down in peace among my beloved books to write the story of the Drama of Yesterday and To-day. If I have sufficient health and strength, the book will be ready before the summer-time of 1899."

AMONG forthcoming books of reminiscences will be the Sketches from Memory of Mr. G. A. Storey, A.R.A. Artists have a knack of making their personal gossip very readable—more so than the personal gossip of many professional literary men—and this may turn out to be a worthy companion of Mr. Frith's engaging volumes.

ANOTHER American change of title. Across the Atlantic Mr. W. W. Jacobs's Sea Urchins is called "More Cargoes."

Bibliographical.

Is Fenimore Cooper being read as largely by the young people of to-day as he was by boys when we ourselves were young? Surely he must have many readers, for there are frequent editions of his tales. The new illustrated edition of the Leatherstocking Stories has suggested an essay by Mr. Kebbel in Macmillan's, and no doubt that essay will somewhat stimulate the demand for the stories, and others from the same hand. Meanwhile, the complete works of Cooper have been issued in New York and London twice, at least, in the nineties (in 1890 and in 1895); while in the same space of time there have been reprints of The Spy, The Pilot, The Deerslayer, the Last of the Mohicans (1894 and 1896), The Pathfinder, The Pioneers, The Prairie, of the Leatherstocking series in uniform volumes (1890), and of other fictions by Cooper. Mr. Kebbel's article, by the way, should be pointed out to boys, for it tells them the order in which the Leatherstocking Stories should be read—a matter of some importance if the tales are to be enjoyed to the full.

All who are interested in dramatic literature will be glad to know that the text of "The Importance of Being Earnest"—in which Mr. George Alexander, Mr. Aynsworth, and Miss Irene Vanbrugh were so excellent at the St. James's, and which most critics regarded as one of the brightest and most effervescent of modern comedies—is to be published before long by Mr. Leonard Smithers. Collectors of such work already have on their shelves the text of "Lady Windermere's Fan" and of "A Woman of No Importance," published by Mr. Lane in 1893 and 1894 respectively. In the last-named year appeared, also, the English version of "Salome," which had been printed in the original French in 1893. "An Ideal Husband" will, no doubt, be published in due course.

If the spirit of Shakespeare is conscious of what goes on in the England which it used to inhabit, it must find a pleasant refuge from the censure of Mr. Bernard Shaw and the patronage of Mr. William Archer in the inexhaustible series of editions of the Works. No sooner is one such edition completed than another is announced. The latest is to be in ten volumes, with an introduction to each play and notes at the foot of the page. There is nothing new, I need hardly say, in this scheme, which was wrought out years ago in a single handy volume, since transformed into two volumes. Personally, I think that if there are to be notes at all they should be, as in the promised instance, at the foot of the page. Everything should be made easy to the student in these busy days.

Many will be pleased to read the "Reminiscences" of Mrs. John Drew when they appear in Scribner's Magazine (prefaced by her son), but we must not hope to find in them many definite facts. Actors and actresses—especially actresses—hate dates. Look at the "Stray Memories" which Miss Ellen Terry wrote or dictated for the New Review, and look at the "Dramatic Opinions" which Mrs. Kendal wrote or dictated for Murray's Magazine. They make, for many, delightful reading; but how vague are the references to the Where and the When! A few players are indifferent to the flight of time, and frank about it; but not so the majority, who can rarely be pinned down to the exact year or place—unless printed record is too much for them.

To judge from the letters he has addressed to a London morning newspaper, Mr. Walter Wood, author of Famous British War-Ships and their Commanders, appears to think that the conception of that book was absolutely novel. That it was not entirely so may, I think, be assumed from the fact that there was published, so long ago as 1863, a little book, entitled Famous Ships of the British Navy, which did an excellent work, I believe, in its own day. Mr. Wood's suggestion, that Mr. Fitchett was indebted to his Famous British War-Ships in compiling Fights for the Flag, is not to me convincing. Compilers who go to the same sources for information are apt to tell very much the same story.

The fact that Famous British War-Ships (1897) was anticipated—very largely—by Famous Ships of the British Navy (1863) is not of practical importance. Some subjects have to be treated afresh for every generation. Here, for example, is Mr. Murray Lane advertising a forthcoming work on The Royal Daughters of England, regardless of the fact that the Misses Strickland dealt with at least a phase of the topic between forty and fifty years ago. In the interval much has happened in the way of historical research, and Mr. Lane is quite justified in giving us once more the stories of the Princesses of our Royal house.

An undaunted versifier is Mr. Warwick Bond. I seem to remember that he prefaced his latest little volume of verse with a quite touching lament concerning the troubles of the minor poet. Yet I see he announces a new book—a dramatic poem, I think—called Zenobia, and I dare say we shall have more such works from his pen. Within the present decade he has given us The Immortals, and Other Poems, An Ode to the Sun, and Other Poems, At Stratford Festival, and so forth. He is quite right, I fancy: verse, to succeed, must be either very fine or very "popular"; for the minor poet, apparently, there is less and less opportunity of being accepted.

At last we are to have, in volume form, a selection from Mr. R. H. Hutton's essays contributed to the Spectator. We already have Mr. Hutton's Contemporary Thought and Thinkers (in two volumes, 1894) and his Modern Guides of English Thought in Faith (1887), which were accepted as welcome supplements to his elder Essays Theological and Literary. It was, however, obvious that much good work of his lay embedded in the columns of the Spectator, from which it was proper that it should be rescued.

"The Duchess of Malfi" has been performed in London at a date comparatively recent. The prologue, however, which Mr. Swinburne has written for the play, and which appears in the current Nineteenth Century, was not composed for that representation. It is a purely spontaneous tribute, which has had its basis in Mr. Swinburne's well-known enthusiasm for the Elizabethan drama.

Reviews.

William Watson: a Retrospect.

The Collected Poems of William Watson. (John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. WILLIAM WATSON now takes his place among the poets who have so far passed the test of time as to step into a collective edition. He has stood his limitation, and the tribunes (which, by interpretation, is the critics) endow him with the people's voices. Nor is Mr. Watson, we imagine, Coriolanus enough to find them anything but "most sweet voices." The critic who casts a retrospective eye over this well-filled volume will not deny that he has deserved his popularity. There is enough to be popular, enough for ballast, and enough to endure. A posy might be made from it of things complete and excellent. Mr. Watson has been hailed as the inheritor of Wordsworth's tradition. For our part we are sorry that he should so have been hailed. It tends to encourage his chief danger, the fluency which would have wrecked the Rydal master had he been a lesser man, and marred him seriously as it was. It is not when Mr. Watson is sedulously reminding us that his initials are W. W.—not then is it we most admire him. Nor do we consider his best power Wordsworthian. His austerity is of a more cold and classical cast than Wordsworth's: in the sparse poems which are touched with warmer tinge there is a breath of romance quite alien to the elder poet. He has nothing of Wordsworth's subtle pathos, nor that sudden and most secret magic which every now and again transfigures Wordsworth's most unconsidered speech. Mr. Watson's general style, at its best, is marmoreal.

It is possible, from most of his longer poems, to quote nobly-wrought stanzas, striking phrases. Yet the total effect is apt to be weakened by the too ready flow which dilutes them with weaker verses. "The Raven's Shadow" is a sample. Down to the last three stanzas the thought is watered by fluency. Then, in the closing couplet of the ante-penultimate stanza, there is a felicitous change, and the poem ends finely, redeemingly:

Though the flowers be faultless made,
Perfectly to live and die—
Though the bright clouds bloom and fade
Flow'rlike 'midst a meadowy sky—
Where this raven roams forlorn,
Veins of midnight flaw the morn.
He not less will croak and croak
As he ever caws and caws,
Till the starry dance be broke,
Till the sphery pean pause,
And the universal chime
Falter out of tune and time.
Coils the labyrinthine sea,
Duteous to the lunar will,
But some discord stealthily
Vexes the world-ditty still,
And the bird that caws and caws
Clasps creation with his claws.

The felicitous phrasing of the line we have italicised strikes the closing note at once. "The Father of the Forest," full of noble passages, exhibits the same mixture. A little compression would make it a much finer poem.

This is, of course, a fault on the right side for popular comprehension, which will pardon any amount of expansion, but is relentless towards faults of compression. Let us, however, turn to the poems in which Mr. Watson finds himself completely. He is a master of criticism in verse, whether literary or political. Not a deep thinker, it is an advantage to him, so to speak, to have his material ready-made; he is suited by an objective theme. In the political sonnet he excels, for the sonnet form also curbs his tendency to expansion. The three sonnets called "The World in Armour" are all excellent, and the last extremely fine, worthy of a master. Both it and the admirable sonnet to Tennyson are too well known, however, for quotation. One could wish he had practised the sonnet in general more. Of the sonnet's spirit, though not the sonnet's form, are the felicitous blank-verse lines on Landor's Hellenics. But if we were to choose a specimen of Mr. Watson's austere vein at its highest, it would be the beautiful marble lyric, "Lux Perdita":

Thine were the weak, slight hands
That might have taken this strong soul, and bent
Its stubborn substance to thy soft intent,
And bound it unresisting, with such bands
As not the arm of envious heaven had rent.

Thine were the calming eyes
That round my pinnacle could have stilled the sea,
And drawn thy voyager home, and bid him be Pure with their pureness, with their wisdom wise, Merged in their light, and greatly lost in thee.

But thou—thou passed'st on,
With whiteness clothed of dedicated days,
Cold, like a star; and me in alien ways
Thou leftest, following life's chance lure, where shone
The wandering gleam that beckons and betrays.

The last stanza is of a stately, calm perfection, which recalls the best classic traditions. Mr. Watson has there had a great moment: and in like vein is the lyric called "The Sovereign Poet."

Beautiful, in a different way, is the whole of the "Ode to May." We must find room for the last half:

For of old the Sun, our sire,
Came wooing the mother of men,
Earth, that was virginal then,
Vestal fire to his fire,
Silent her besom and coy;
But the strong god sued and pressed,
And born of their starry nuptial joy
Are all that drink of her breast.

And the triumph of him that begot,
And the travail of her that bore,
Behold, they are evermore
As warp and weft in our lot.
We are children of splendour and fame,
Of shuddering, also, and tears.
Magnificent out of the dust we came,
And abject from the spheres.

O bright irresistible lord,
We are fruit of Earth's womb, each one,
And fruit of thy loins, O Sun,
Whence first was the seed outpoured.

To thee as our Father we bow,
Forbidden thy Father to see,
Who is older and greater than thou, as thou Art greater and older than we.

Thou art but as a word of his speech,
Thou art but as a wave of his hand;
Thou art brief as a glitter of sand
'Twixt tide and tide on his beach;
Thou art less than a spark of his fire,
Or a moment's mood of his soul:
Thou art lost in the notes on the lips of his choir
That chant the chant of the Whole."

There is an ardour in that, alien to the usual spirit of Mr. Watson's muse. But, indeed, the very greatest of his odes, that to "Autumn," is in a vein more like Keats than Wordsworth. We are sorry that its length forbids us to quote this rich and fervid poem. Let us be content with a most lovely little lyric, the subtlest thing that Mr. Watson has written, to our mind.

Thy voice from inmost dreamland calls,
The wastes of sleep thou makest fair;
Bright o'er the ridge of darkness falls
The cataract of thy hair.

The morn renews its golden birth:
Thou with the vanquished night dost fade,
And leav'st the ponderable earth
Less real than thy shade.

There is the innermost mystery and regret of all vision in this exquisite poem. Every now and again, indeed, as we traverse Mr. Watson's book, there break through the sedate Wordsworthian manner which is his choice, his deliberate ideal, gleams of the romantic muse, tokens of a gift of fancy which is too seldom suffered to quit its cage. The "Autumn" and the lyric we have quoted are the supreme exhibition of this more blossom mood. But one finds it even in a casual touch like

Bid me no more to leave unvisited
That rose-wreathed porch of pearl.

To conclude: in so far as he is derivative, Mr. Watson makes defence of himself, at once frank, humble, and dignified, in the Apologia with which he fittingly ends this volume. Retrospect exhibits a poet conscientious, craftsmanlike, steady in worthy aim; who, if he does not always touch the heights to which his eyes are lifted, in a choice number of poems attains them perfectly; while the total range of accomplishment covered by these elect poems is greater than mere recollection could have prepared us to surmise. For we have omitted from this brief and necessarily inadequate survey his poems on poets, which carry the critical nineteenth century spirit with such novelty into verse; nor have we touched upon many long poems appealing for attention—the well-known "Wordsworth's Grave," or the striking "Dream of Man," for instance. We have rather dwelt upon the less familiar side of his genius; in which, paradoxically, he nevertheless seems to us to achieve his most beautiful and complete successes. This collection, bringing to focus the best of his work, is a distinct gain to all who have followed his career with admiration and sympathy, justifying the esteem he has conquered by patient and self-respecting labour.

The Grandeur that was Rome.

Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire.
By Samuel Dill, M.A., Professor of Greek in Queen's College, Belfast. (Macmillan. 12s. net.)

THERE is more than a frigid rhetoric in the famous appeal of Symmachus to Valentinian for the restoration of the Altar of Victory in the Senate House of Rome: "We implore peace for the gods of our country, for our native gods. It is but just to recognise, beneath varying worship, one sole Divinity. We behold the same stars; we share the same heavens; the same world embraces us. What matters it in what manner each man seeks the truth? A single road is not enough whereby to arrive at the mighty mystery." Strangely moving, the appeal of the dethroned deities, in the name of tolerance, to the Galilean victor: dona nobis pacem! Strangely touching, the voice of ancient Rome lamenting her vanished past; her eyes bent backward, refusing to foresee her Christian empire and spiritual conquest of the world! It is a period of profoundly human interest, that century which saw the end of the Western Empire under the rule of a little child bearing the pathetic and ironic name of Romulus Augustulus. Mr. Dill's work upon it is well worthy to stand beside M. Boissier's La Fin du Paganisme, and higher praise we have not to give. His erudition does not cumber him: his style is lucid and attractive, his judgment is impartial and sympathetic, he gives life and reality to a most crowded, various, puzzling passage of time. He invests Symmachus, Ausonius, Sidonius, and their contemporaries with the charm of intimate personality; while his general appreciations and descriptions of the age are as skilful as they are learned. That he once writes Propertius for Persius is probably the one positive blemish upon his very welcome volume.

Profani si quid bene dixerunt, non aspernandum. This utterance of St. Augustine expresses the continuity of feeling with which Latin Christendom regarded the arts and sciences, laws and institutions of pagan Rome. To such ecumenical minds as his the empire of Rome was the creation of Divine providence, second only to the theocracy of Israel. Both were preparations for the Christian Church and Gospel, both venerable and august. Despite fanatics and extremists, it was impossible for Christianity to make tabula rasa of the historic past. Augustine had Virgil in his veins, Jerome was laughably shocked at his own inveterate Ciceronianism; their views of the pagan epochs were enlightened and large. "If these books agree with the Koran, they are superfluous; if not, they are pernicious: let them then be burned!" But not in the manner of the Caliph Omar at Alexandria did the wisest of the Christian leaders deal with the sages and singers of antiquity. They found in the workings of Providence something not unlike a law of progress and evolution, an orderly unfolding of Divine purpose, and they did not think that for Christians the world must date, in all things, from the birth of Christ. The accusation that Christianity was inimical to the empire and responsible for its weakness, that the Catholic Church could come to no terms with the ancient civility, that her influence was barbarising and effeminate, that the Roman world was perishing of the Christian faith, produced the magnificent De Civitate Dei of Augustine, with its pedantic pendant, the History of Orosius. If Rome be in mortal sickness, she has her own degeneracy to thank for it, her falling away from her pristine spirit; but greater than the City of the World, which, as Rutilius sings, had made of orbs one urbs, is the City of God "not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," whereof all are citizens in Christ. Augustine's mind was of imperial cast, and he towers in an age of littleness. But what was this age, in which Paganism still wore the senatorial robe, in which there were pagan seoptics and sceptical Christians, in which superstition ran riot and all looks chaotic? An age in which the "barbarians" play their great part of "casting the kingdoms old into another mould"; an age of perplexed transition and fermentation; an age in labour with new times and things; an uncomfortable, aching, fascinating age. In spite of incessant legislation, an age of infinite social and official corruption; in spite of deep reverence for education, an age of elegant dilettantism and rhetoric, of conventional preciousness; an age stricken with mental nervelessness, lacking originality, magnanimity, greatness, and, while crying out for its Carlylean "man," never discovering him. An age, as Tacitus called his own, of Deum ira in rem Romanam, and an age of Gesta Dei per Francos and other "barbarians." And in the midst of the confusion we contemplate, with amusement and amazement, half contemptuous, half sympathising, the figures so vividly portrayed by Mr. Dill. They are the victims of rhetoric, of the tyranny of words, of style leading substance captive; with infinite pains they attain to saying nothing to the glory of culture.

Aiming at a last refinement of style, heirs of Greek and Roman ages, they do not approach to even the rude felicity of Ennius; living amid wars and the rumour of wars, at a time when the world was in upheaval and unrest, they write, these men of the world, as though they lived in an earthly paradise of précieux ridicules. Symmachus held offices of high dignity, and led the Senate; Ausonius rose from a provincial professoriate to posts of splendid rank; Sidonius was a bishop; yet it is the rarest thing to find in their writings any strong and serious trace of social, religious, political, national feeling—anything of the old Roman gravitas or pietas or virtus. The rise and fall of emperors, the advent of invaders, the turmoil and tumult of the times, provoke from them scarce any utterance instinct with manly vigour and reality. By the side of their great Roman predecessors they are as dancers beside athletes. Even Ausonius, at his best, cannot rise above an imperturbable prettiness; and he was something of a true poet, much of a true scholar, and a man of wide experience. The letters of Symmachus, says Villemain, "élégantes et ingénieuses, sont stériles de faits et de sentiments"; such sterility marks an age of decadence. But the last hundred years of the Western Empire, though full of rottenness and decay, were stirring and arousing; yet, except in Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, they yield us little better than feeble pomposity, dainty affectation, and rhetoric. St. Paulinus of Nola, young, rich, accomplished, retires from the world: his master and friend, Ausonius, begs him to return in the name of the Muses. Paulinus, a man of beautiful character and strong will, declines in language worthy of our Georgian poets laureate; Phoebus and Delos jostle Christ and the Day of Judgment. There is a certain pathos in this clinging to the forms of pagan culture, this recognition of "the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome": we are reminded of the austere Savonarola, strengthened in his resolve to flee the world by a line of Virgil. On all sides, and notably in Southern Gaul, we find an amiable, earnest, slightly ludicrous pre-occupation with letters and learning: upon this ground pagan and Christian could meet, could revere together the golden ages of antiquity and the genius of Rome. But, except in the matter of mutual charity, they did so to very little purpose, though with praiseworthy intent.

The late paganism of the empire, from Constantine's Edict of Toleration in 313, up to its sinking underground and passing into a kind of folk-lore, is singularly interesting. What kept an educated man from accepting Christianity; at least, in name? Many Christians wore their faith lightly, and easily cast it off. Ausonius, to put it gently, was not an ardent Christian. It is still a question whether Boëthius, born at the very death of the Western Empire, was Christian or not. To be a Christian was a worldly advantage: to be a pagan was, at least at certain times and under certain emperors, a criminal offence. Christianity was no longer an obscure, illiterate Jewish superstition: it wore the purple; it possessed the learning of the ancients; it largely "reconciled" Plato with the Gospel; it had no enmity against art; it was liberal and humane; it showed itself consistent with cultivated society and civil government. The very earliest work of Christian apologetics in Latin—the Octavius of Minucius Felix, contemporary with Tertullian—is written by a cultured convert in a tone of winning suavity and grace. What was there in imperial paganism to retain its adherents when approached by a philosophical, courteous, candid Christianity? Paganism among the pagani, the rustic villagers, was doubtless the primitive, ancestral faith of Numa; but the senators, consuls, prefects, lecturers, men of letters, in Rome and the great provincial centres, assuredly held no such simply natural a faith as that. How was it that, "philosophe et homme d'état, Symmaque défendait, au milieu du siècle de Théodose, la culte et la théogonie de Numa"? It was largely an unconscious mysticism of feeling about Rome, the City of the World. Could the Papacy be transferred from Rome, it would take many generations to transfer to another place the Catholic feeling of devotion. Ave Roma Immortalis! And the patrician, scholarly, official classes of the fourth and fifth centuries included many to whom the long glory of Rome was a religion, and her genius the true D.O.M. They did not refuse to acknowledge many divinities, nor to hold vague semi-Platonic theosophies; but Christianity was exclusive, while claiming catholicity. They felt that it was no religion for gentlemen of Rome; noblesse oblige, and it was not for them to renounce the faith which had winged the Roman eagles. An high-bred superiority marks the attitude of such men as Symmachus, a courteous disdain for the new popular creed—something of that hauteur which animated the nobles of France before their fall, even when they foresaw it. In some, forms of oriental devotion, sanctioned by long prescription, supplied the needs of the spirit. Some, sceptics at heart, found paganism easier than Christianity. Not a few shared, with better reason, the views of Smollett's friend, who, "being in the Campidoglio at Rome, made up to the bust of Jupiter, and, bowing very low, exclaimed in the Italian language, 'I hope, sir, if ever you get your head above water again, you will remember that I paid my respects to you in your adversity.'" For amid the shock of barbarian invasion and the profound catastrophe of the taking of Rome, men's minds were moved to speculate upon the cause of such calamities: it was but natural to see in them the wrath of offended Olympus, or the impotence of the Christian Heaven. Again, the sophistical education of the day was debilitating: it tended to produce indifference.

Without wholly damning this "last century" as one of corruption, we may call it one of those ages in which men are inclined, not to grapple with its distress and disease, but to say, with languid resignation, "It will last our time." So died out, with Romulus Augustulus, the empire of the Caesars. The next to wear the crown of the West will be a "barbarian," but a mightily enlightened one: Carolus Magnus, a true Caesar, worthy to inaugurate with glory the Middle Age.

Well Written.

Government and Democracy, and Other Essays. By John Jay Chapman. (Nutt. 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a brilliant little book. Mr. Chapman wields a razor-edge of forcible statement, and he is inspired by a moral passion that makes his utterance a breathing, vital thing.

JOHN J. CHAPMAN.

The volume arose, he tells you, "out of an attempt to explain an election," and the key to it all is in the opening essay on "Politics." This is the most complete and scathing indictment of American corruption that we have ever read, and it is in the compass of forty-six pages. In this space Mr. Chapman turns the whole fabric of a society inside out like an old glove.

"Misgovernment in the United States," says Mr. Chapman, "is an incident in the history of commerce. It is part of the triumph of industrial progress." The close of the war left the country divided into two bitterly hostile parties, Democrats and Republicans. The original bone of contention was removed, but the organisations remained. And bit by bit, during thirty years, the forces of capital seized on these and wrested them to their own ends. Mr. Chapman takes as an example a small country town through which ran a railroad, and shows with remorseless analysis how that railroad, working through a sharp local attorney, with unlimited powers of bribery at his back, gradually got control of the politics of that town. First one party organisation is manipulated and put in the hands of a "boss," or paid wire-puller. Then the other follows, and the two are played off against each other as the capitalist desires. Ultimately the process is complete. "The town is now ruled by a Happy Family. Stable equilibrium has been reached at last. Commercialism is in control. Henceforth the railroad company pays the bills for keeping up both party organisations, and it receives care and protection from whichever party is nominally in power." What Mr. Chapman here describes as occurring on a small scale has happened on a large scale in almost every State and every municipality in America. In New York, in particular, the vast Democratic organisation of Tammany Hall is the tool of the mercantile interests. And the same interests equally control the opposing organisation of the Republicans. The two party bosses, curtly described as Croker and Platt, face each other with the wink of Roman augurs. "Whichever wins at the polls, the result is the same. "It has always been the ear-mark of an enterprise of the first financial magnitude in New York that it subscribed to both campaign funds."

After describing the system and briefly indicating its effects upon the standards of municipal and personal morality, Mr. Chapman turns to the hope of reform. For there is, and has been for some time, a strong reform movement growing up in the heart of New York itself. Business men, professional men, literary men have banded themselves together into bodies known as "Good Government Clubs" for the express purpose of promoting reform. Hitherto they have been notoriously unsuccessful at the polls. In the recent mayoralty election Mr. Low only polled half the Tammany vote. Mr. Chapman thinks that the reformers have gone to work in the wrong way. They have attempted to work on the old party lines, to meet corruption with its own weapons. They have not thrown themselves unreservedly enough upon idealism; have not realised that their function must be for some time that of educators, rather than of statesmen. The pendulum, he declares, has swung in the right direction, but the men of the future still need a policy: above all, they still need a political philosophy. They have been exploited by commercialism, but they have not been undermined. "The grip of commerce is growing weaker, the voice of conscience louder. A phase in our history is passing away. That phase was predestined from the beginning. . . . We see that our institutions were particularly susceptible to this disease of commercialism, and that the sickness was acute, but that it was not mortal. Our institutions survived."

Starting, then, from the conclusions of this opening essay, and fortifying himself by the psychological doctrines which underlie the teaching of Froebel, Mr. Chapman sets himself to sketch a system of political and social morality conceived on lines at once individualistic and altruistic. The whole book is freshly thought out and, to our mind, admirably put. It is full of pregnant suggestive phrases, of ironic flashlights on the society it condemns. What could be better than the whole description of the deadening effect of commercial dishonesty on the whole of American life and American letters? At the club no man will express an opinion on the most indifferent subject. His daily avocations make him furtive. The thing is like a deadly blight on all humane activity. "The second-rate quality of all our letters and verse is due to the same cause. The intellectual integrity is undermined. The literary man is concerned for what 'will go,' like the reformer who is half politician. The attention of every one in the United States is on some one else's opinion, not on truth." There is a very interesting passage on the absence in America of that "reservoir of spiritual power" which, according to Mr. Chapman, has "turned the tide of commercialism in England," and has produced in London a body of men and women who "work like beavers in its reform." But it is precisely such large-brained, large-souled books as this of Mr. Chapman's which go to create such reservoirs of spiritual power. He has our God-speed in his wrestle with the Augean stables.

Mr. Runciman's Musical Essays.

Old Scores and New Readings. By J. F. Runciman. (The Unicorn Press.)

THE name of Mr. J. F. Runciman is one that has headed a hundred alarms and excursions into the camps of many complacent and over-content warriors. During the past few years he has been the terror of the Academic school of musical expression, of old-fashioned and perfunctory criticism, and of that ignorance which is never so happy as when it is engaged in labelling a difference of view with the same name. He has keen and incisive cleverness; he is a musician to the finger-tips; he has independence of thought and of expression, and he is as courageous as a Viking. Having premised so much it would be absurd to deny that he has the defects of his qualities highly developed. If he is clever, he is sometimes consciously paradoxical; if he is a fine musician, he sometimes makes his music too personal an affair; if he is fearlessly independent, he sometimes mistakes unwarrantable satire for frankness of utterance; and, finally, if he is courageous, with no trace of cowardice or of compromise in him, he is inclined to forget that courage and refinement of sympathy are not always of necessity playing as respondent and co-respondent in the Divorce Court. Well, that being said, Mr. Runciman has just submitted to the world a volume containing some of his more elaborate musical essays that have been published of recent years in the pages of the Saturday Review, the New Review, and the Dome. In such collected form, we should be inclined to say that not since the time of Berlioz has so individual and so keenly clever a collection of papers on music been placed before the public. Mr. Runciman, indeed—perhaps somewhat arrogantly—claims, in a rather too personal dedication to Mr. Frank Harris, that "this is the first time that a critic has shut off no part of himself from the influence of music, and has kept back no part of the resulting impression of the effect, produced by music upon his entire human soul." That is, we submit, a little grotesque. Berlioz did it, and Wagner did it; and Berlioz, at all events, was a master of letters; whereas we are not quite sure that it can be fully allowed to Mr. Runciman that he has, without the intrusion of prejudice, really accomplished this feat; and though he writes exceedingly well, at all events for every purpose that he has in view—sometimes in this respect his felicity is marvellous—he cannot be described as a master of letters. We speak now, of course, from a somewhat high and exclusive literary point of view.

From what we have already written, it will be gathered that the actual essays under consideration come to the reader with a double meaning—a meaning of welcome and of (shall we say it?) a slight repulsion. They fall more or less into just these two sections. Those on Purcell, Haydn, Schubert, "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Siegfried," Brahms and Dvorák seem to us to be brilliant, adequate, and distinguished by wonderful directness and straightness of insight. The Purcell, we are inclined to think, is the best of all. Here Mr. Runciman is on ground which he not only knows extremely well, but which also is sufficiently remote to keep him more or less from those contemporary quarrels in which he has ever been a foremost fighter. Thus he writes of his beloved English composer—as he calls him, "our last great musician":

Purcell is also a chief, though not the chief, among song-writers. And he stands in the second place by reason of the very faculty which places him among the first of instrumental and choral writers. That dominating picturesque power of his, that tendency to write picturesque melodies as well as picturesque movements, compelled him to treat the voice as he treated any other instrument, and he writes page on page which would be at least as effective on any other instrument; and as more can be got out of the voice than out of any other instrument, and the tip-top song-writers got all out that could be got out, it follows that Purcell is below them. But only the very greatest of them have beaten him, and he often, by sheer perfection of phrases, runs them very close.

That is a luminous bit of criticism, despite the somewhat casual form—note the repetition of "got" three times and "out" four times within a few lines—in which it is uttered. But there is little in this essay that is not masterly, from the critical standpoint. The "Lohengrin" article, again, is a beautiful piece of work, in which Mr. Runciman has really caught the central idea of the opera from a new and fresh point of view. His feeling for the river that flows from Monsalvat to Brabant seems to us to be a really fine excursion into the shores of romantic criticism. The "Note on Brahms," too, is excellent, distinguishing as it does, in admirable fashion, the pretentious from the real in that over-praised musician, and discovering where the true poignancy of Brahms' tragic utterance lay, in the realisation, that is, of his own want of inspiration. But Mr. Runciman is not unfair:

It must be remembered that all his music is irreproachable from the technical point of view. Brahms is certainly with Bach, Mozart, and Wagner in point of musicianship; in fact, these four might be called the greatest masters of sheer music who have lived. A Brahms score is as wonderful as a Wagner score; from beginning to end there is not a misplaced note nor a trace of weakness; and one stands amazed before the consummate workmanship of the thing. The only difference between the Wagner score and the Brahms score is, that while the former is always alive the latter is sometimes alive too, but more frequently as dead as a door-mat.

Among the less keen, or (at any rate) less pleasant essays of the book we must rank first of all that on "Parsifal." It strikes throughout, as it seems to us, a false, even perhaps a braggart, note, and the braggart note is nearly always insincere. Mr. Runciman sets out on what seems to be a little tour de force of his own, and for some reason or another he does not carry his theory off brilliantly enough. Done with a Stevensonian lightness, the attempt to prove "Parsifal" an immoral work might have been amusing; as a matter of fact, it succeeds in being a little dismal. The Verdi article, again, is too slight to support all the theory that he burthens it with, and once more that is because his manner of writing does not here quite suit the matter in hand. In a word, we are forced for a conclusion upon Mr. Runciman's literary style. For his own particular purpose, to express his deeply felt and original views on music, it is absolutely adequate and peculiarly personal. Where he essays the easy manner of the man of letters, as, for example, in the dedication, and writes for the sake of his words, he does not reach his right level of excellence; and you can always discover when he has wandered a little way from his real self by these subtle differences (as you may put it) in his elocution. His book remains, however, a living contribution to the musical literature of the times.

The Prettiest Beguilement.

Dream Days. By Kenneth Grahame. (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

MR. KENNETH GRAHAME'S Dream Days is an extension of his Golden Age. It has the same qualities, the same charm. Hence there is not much that is fresh to say about it. Perhaps it is, by a shade, not so good; but the shade is of the slightest, and to all those who ask for fun before everything the new volume will stand as the better. For ourselves, we have read it with pure and rippling delight, and we now feel in no mood for anything but praise. Because—when a gentleman devotes his leisure to so gay and innocent an employment as remembering his childhood, and recording his memories with wit and delicate literary art, there seems to us no call for anything else. He makes no challenge. He merely says: "If you are for pretty beguilement, try this"; and having tried it, we admit the beguilement, and recommend it to others. There are tender, fragile books which it is a mistake to "review" in the ordinary way, and Dream Days is conspicuous among them.

The peculiar joy of Dream Days is Harold. In The Golden Age he did some beautiful things, notably in "The Burglars," but in Dream Days he is continually busy and persuasive. Here, from "Dies Iræ," a sketch of one of those days when nothing ever goes right, is a glimpse of Harold at a favourite game:

Somewhat disheartened, I made my way downstairs and out into the sunlight, where I found Harold playing conspirators by himself on the gravel. He had dug a small hole in the walk, and had laid an imaginary train of powder thereto; and as he sought refuge in the laurels from the inevitable explosion, I heard him murmur, "'My God!' said the Czar, 'my plans are frustrated!'" It seemed an excellent occasion for being a black puma. Harold liked black pumas, on the whole, as well as any animal we were familiar with. So I launched myself on him, with the appropriate howl, rolling him over on the gravel.

Life may be said to be composed of things that come off and things that don't come off. This thing, unfortunately, was one of the things that didn't come off. From beneath me I heard a shrill cry of, "Oh! it's my sore knee." And Harold wriggled himself free from the puma's clutches, bellowing dismally. Now, I honestly didn't know he had a sore knee, and what's more, he knew I didn't know that he had a sore knee. According to boy ethics, therefore, his attitude was wrong, sore knee or not, and no apology was due from me. I made half-way advances, however, suggesting we should lie in ambush by the edge of the pond and cut off the ducks as they waddled down in simple, unsuspecting single file, then hunt them as bisons flying over the vast prairie. . . . But Harold would none of my overtures, and retreated to the house wailing with full lungs.

Mr. Grahame goes on to tell how this rebuff, coming upon so many others, was the last straw. He left the garden, an Ishmael. Yet "somewhere in the world, I felt sure, justice and sympathy still resided. There were places called pampas, for instance, that sounded well. League upon league of grass, with just an occasional wild horse, and not a relation within the horizon!"

In "Mutabile Semper" Harold is discovered at another pursuit. While the others are painting or musing upon love Harold is composing a "death-letter." A death-letter is practically a will, a disposal of personal estate. Harold's death-letter ran thus:

my dear edward when I die I leave all my muny to you my walkin sticks wips my crop my sord and gun bricks forts and all things i have goodbye my dear charlotte when i die I leave you my wach and cumpus and pencil case my salors and camperdown my pictares and evthing goodbye your loving brother armen my dear Martha I love you very much i leave you my garden my mice and rabets my plants in pots when I die please take care of them my dear.

Selina, it may be remarked, objected to her exclusion. "I don't care," said Harold; "I was going to leave you something, but I shan't now 'cos you tried to read my death-letter before I was dead" (there had been a fearful fight). "Then I'll write a death-letter myself," retorted Selina, "and I shan't leave you a single thing!" Selina, however, though thoroughly worsted in this particular story, has her own glorious moments, and the account of her celebration of Trafalgar Day is one of the best things of the book.

Here we must leave this charming little work. We have said nothing of Mr. Grahame's sympathy with child nature, his penetration and kindly humour; but that is because we have said these things before. They are commonplaces.

A Political Pilgrimage.

Notes from a Diary in Asiatic Turkey. By Lord Warkworth, M.P. (Edward Arnold. 21s.)

LORD WARKWORTH, whose Oxford career was one of the most distinguished of recent times, undertook an expedition last year in company with Lord Encombe, Sir John Stirling-Maxwell, and Mr. Lionel Holland, from Angora, through Armenia and Kurdistan, to Mosul. The country was still unquiet after the massacres, and the four Englishmen found the way barred with trifling obstructions. They persevered, and were able to pass safely through some very dangerous parts, and to acquire a first-hand knowledge—what few Europeans have possessed. The main object of the journey was political, and the political conclusion is of great interest. Lord Warkworth insists upon what may now be regarded as a proven fact—the political nature of the massacres. He analyses with much shrewdness the Turkish attitude towards England and Russia. He confesses himself frankly a Turcophil, but he has no roseate hopes for a reconstitution of the Turkish empire from within. In all his judgments he is moderate, reasonable, and well-informed.

But the book is not a political treatise. It seems to us that the travellers must have been hampered by their means of information. To make their results practically valuable, names and details would need to be appended; but this could scarcely be done without a direct betrayal of confidence. Hence the book is as much the itinerary of a man of culture as the record of a political student. The antiquities on the route—classical, Christian, mediæval—are described by the author with a scholar's enthusiasm. He finds Perrot in an error concerning the "Hittite" palace at Boghaz Keni, and on another point he joins issue with Mr. Hogarth. He tells a curious story to illustrate the local prejudice against the ascent of Ararat. "Ararat," said an Armenian priest on the road between Erzeroum and Bayazid, "is the birthplace of mankind; and we know, on the authority of our Saviour's own words to Nicodemus, that a man cannot enter a second time into his mother's womb and be born"—"a quotation of Scripture," says Lord Warkworth, "which, like so many others of its kind, would be more convincing if the quotation were borne out by the text!" Towards the end of the journey he found an Arab patriarch who was immensely flattered because some religious body in America had conferred on him a distinction called the "Crown of Thorns." The book does not profess to be a picturesque history, but the style has a vivacity of its own, and now and then we get a cleanly-drawn picture. Take this:

The dingy room into which we were ushered by a ragged crew was lit by spiral tapers of bees'-wax, and clouded with the dense smoke of a wood-fire. Our bed-fellows were a horse, and a buffalo whose vulgarly noisy and prolonged munching of his evening meal compelled us, in the interests of slumber, to suggest to its owners that they should limit the supply of fodder. The cure, however, proved worse than the disease, for the outraged animal vented its displeasure in such continuous and unmusical protests that at length we were forced to an unconditional surrender.

Or this:

Its rickety bridges and quaint brick houses striped in bands of brilliant cobalt along the water's edge, and its little inlets fringed with glossy-leaved bananas and overhanging palms, whose feathery tops glance like pale blue sprays of hoarfrost under the moon.

The book is illustrated with a great number of the most beautiful photographs we remember to have seen in a work of the kind.

A Great Englishman.

Some Account of George William Wilshere, Baron Bramwell of Hever, and His Opinions. By Charles Fairfield. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

A FEW days ago the present writer asked a thoughtful man what impression he had formed of a judge of the Queen's Bench Division while serving as a common jurymen. It appeared that he had brought away the conviction that our judges work very hard and very carefully. Many, very many, of us have come to the same conclusion; and the thought braces us as we splash past the Law Courts in the rain. Mr. Fairfield knows how wide and silent and real this tribute is, and in the first sentence of his book he says with happy intelligence: "The memoirs of each memorable judge which Her Majesty's public constructs for itself is 'He sat there and did what was right, and is dead!'"

Lord Bramwell was of this great brood. His life-story is that of a man, English to the core, and endowed with great talents, who wasted none of his strength, but kneaded it and applied it until it became at once colossal and humane. Lord Bramwell was a great judge, not only by profession, but in that he was overlastingly set on doing justice. "Anybody's wrong was his own personal wrong." Hence, when he left the Bench, he thundered judgments in the Times. What letters those "B." letters were—one's brain glories in them!

Anecdotes? There are fewer, perhaps, than one expected, but the need of them is not great; Mr. Fairfield's pages are briny enough. Yet to save ourselves from reproach, take two pictures. In one Bramwell is saying to a monstrous assaulter of children: "Your counsel tells me that four years' penal servitude will kill you. I don't care if it does kill you." In another he is warning a jury to disregard the burst of tears into which he had been betrayed while summing up against a poor old woman of seventy, indicted for the murder of her husband. Both moods were exceptional—but they declare the man. We can but name that immortal contention on "Drink" in the Times which the men of water and the men of whisky watched with alternating ecstasies, while now the Law Lord and now the author of Eric quoted the Scriptures in ding-dong style, and pelted each other with lines from Propertius and verses of fusty Rabbis.

Taking leave of this great judge, we must think of him on the Bench, working, as Mr. Fairfield says, for "some thing more than pay":

precisely what it is Englishmen are slow to say; also slow to believe, amid the drone, drone, drone of dusty, foggy courts of law, that worn, bent, weary old men one sees sitting on the Bench, these worked and struggled and wore themselves out, buoyed up by the very same spirit which sends often mere lads, full of life, to challenge death in front of their comrades.

Mr. Fairfield has caught the spirit, as well as recorded the multifarious facts, of Lord Bramwell's life, and he has succeeded in conveying both clearly to his readers.

Cannibals Next Door.

Through New Guinea and the Cannibal Countries. By H. Cayley-Webster. (Unwin. 21s.)

THE picture that haunts us most after closing Captain Webster's book is that of the British or German flag floating over little palm-sheltered coves and wharves and custom-houses within hail of cannibalism. In New Britain Captain Webster found smiling plantations managed by European traders, people of refinement, people whose houses suggest the country houses of Western civilisation; and yet, in a walk before tea, you may find villages whose chiefs keep slaves for the purpose of food, and kill them as regularly as an English farmer kills his ducks.

Other dreadful practices are common behind those searings of mangroves where so much of the glamour of these islands begins and ends. The Solomons are still full of head-hunters, and the heads of white men are much in request. Captain Webster writes:

Head-hunting raids are constantly being organised upon villages near at hand, but never has it been known that any one expedition has been formed and sent out to any particular village without first being confident that they were attacking a very much weaker party than their own. On these occasions every available canoe is manned, some of the larger ones holding as many as sixty warriors, who, armed to the teeth, set out on their murderous journey. I have been an eye-witness to more than one such expedition, when a large haul had been made and more than sixty trophies in the shape of heads had been captured, which were immediately smoke-dried and preserved by being plastered over with chinam.

Captain Webster gives a list of white men murdered in this group. On the island of Lombok he saw the modified suttee which prevails there. The unhappy widow is killed by knives instead of by fire. Other of Captain Webster's relations are as frightful; some are necessarily loathsome. As an observer and a collector of natural history specimens, Captain Webster did interesting work, and his book is a genial and thrilling account of wanderings in the darkest places of the earth.

War from Within.

War Memories of an Army Chaplain. By H. Clay Trumbull. (Scribner. 7s. 6d.)

MR. TRUMBULL should have dipped his colours to Mr. Kipling and Mr. Stephen Crane when prefacing his memories of the Northern army in the American Civil War. He says: "Little . . . has been written to show the thoughts and feelings of the soldier in active army service." Little, yes; but that little has been burned into the minds of tens of thousands of readers by two masters of the "reporting" school of fiction. Therefore Mr. Trumbull should have dipped his colours. His own book is entirely readable, if rather spun out. The position of a regimental chaplain in the American struggle was peculiar. He was a commissioned officer without a command. He alone could talk with a general or a private with equal familiarity. To him alone the general and the private could confide their feelings with the same freedom. If, therefore, the chaplain was a good fellow—in the full war sense of the term—he was in the best possible position to gather and record the inner life of the army in which he was a unit. Mr. Trumbull, rather unkindly, shows that there were chaplains and chaplains in the war. There was at least one who failed to secure respect. Said one soldier to another—they were talking of the chaplain of another regiment than their own:

"You don't catch our 'Holy John' up there."

"You don't mean that our chaplain's a coward—do you?" asked the other in a scornful tone.

"Oh, no! I don't say he's a coward; but whenever there's any firing ahead, he has to go for the mail."

"Well, but he's got to go for the mail, you know."

"Yes; but if the firing is sudden, he can't stop to get his saddle on."

Mr. Trumbull's stories of heroism, death, and suffering are legion. The book is almost too much packed with them; it is too long. With more selection, and fewer chapters, this narrative would have been more effective. One sad statement, among many, is that numbers of the soldiers received very few letters from home; the billets that would have softened the bullets were too often lacking. Perhaps the most impressive of Mr. Trumbull's stories is the one on pp. 182-3, about the shooting of a deserter. The facts he gives about desertion are extraordinary. Men deserted and re-enlisted three, five, and seven times over, encouraged by the "substitute-brokers." They were themselves known as "bounty-jumpers." The two expressions carry a world of meaning. One Irish mother naively congratulated herself on the prosperity of her son. Asked what he was doing, she replied: "Well, I'm not quite sure as to that. But I believe they call it 'lapeing the bounty.'" These thrilling tales of war are illustrated with becoming vividness by several artists.

A Gentle Voice.

Summer Sonnets. By Emma J. Parker. (Grant Richards.)

A PRETTIER book than this—vellum-clad and slender and fair-paged—it would be hard to find. Mrs. Parker's poetical output is very small, but it is sweet and simple: a few sonnet memories of notable open-air days; tributes to friends—Dr. Parker and Frances Willard among them; a little garland of songs, wistful and melancholy; and that is all. We quote one of the title poems:

A summer noon, with cloudless fire-filled sky,
Whose kisses scorch the buds its lips caress,
Flushing them with too keen a happiness,
Till drooping 'neath the burning touch they sigh
For twilight's gentler, tenderer ecstasy.
The gossip bees with buzzing eagerness
And droning, iterated emphasis,
Scatter their wondrous tidings as they fly.
The butterflies on pale, frail yellow wings
O'er blue forget-me-nots poise light as air;
And overhead the crimson may-tree swings
Its aromatic fragrance everywhere.
In quiet shade the scented lily rings
Its many bells, calling to midday prayer!

Modest though the tiny collection be, it has a personal character and sincerity; and Mrs. Parker will, we feel confident, make with it new friends.

Postscript.

ANYONE who can make natural history attractive to children, particularly the minutest insect life, is the parents' valued ally. Mrs. Haig Thomas, in Spiderland (Chiswick Press), has done this. Choosing the medium of simple narrative, with much pretty by-play, she has invested some of the mysteries of garden life with a great deal of interest. As a stepping-stone to entomology and botany we can recommend Spiderland very heartily.

To make a sportsman's "Whitaker" is the aim which the editors of The Sportsman's Year-Book (Lawrence & Bullen), Mr. C. S. Colman and Mr. A. H. Windsor, have set before themselves. They have not quite done it yet, but the start is a good one. A sportsman's "Whitaker," for example, would surely give the principal cricket fixtures for 1899 and not merely the test matches with the Australians. It would also, under the cricket books of the past year, mention K. S. Ranjitsinhji's account of Mr. Stoddart's Australian tour. These are blemishes which more forethought might have removed. But as it is an honourable habit to forgive the compilers of annuals for any faults committed in their first issue, we will say no more. The special articles in the book before us are well done, and it is a little, if not a very rich, mine of information.

The S.P.C.K.'s Holy Gospels, which it is proposed to issue in twenty-four monthly parts, begin this month with the first six chapters of the Gospel according to St. John. The page is ample and distinct, and the illustrations, chosen from the Old Masters, are most admirably reproduced. Among the more beautiful pictures in this part are the Virgin of Manucci (Perugino), at Florence; a Florentine Virgin and Christ, in the Berlin Museum; Crivelli's Virgin and Christ, at Milan; Botticelli's Virgin and Child, surrounded by angels, at Florence; Mantegna's Madonna and Holy Child, at Milan; and Cosa's Annunciation, at Dresden.

Another excellent S.P.C.K. publication is the Sketch-Book of British Birds, which Dr. Bowdler Sharpe, of the British Museum, has written and A. F. and C. Lydon have illustrated. Of Dr. Sharpe's ornithological work there is no call to speak: his word is his bond. We must also praise the clever and bright little drawings which lend value to Dr. Sharpe's notes. They are printed with sufficient variety of tint to suggest the prominent hues of life and enable the student of this book to recognise birds from it; but, of course, no effort has been made to reproduce the detailed colouring of, say, a starling's breast. We recommend the volume very cordially to the young naturalist.

Everyone is now a photographer, and many would claim the title of artist too. The question of how far they may deserve the name is discussed very ably by M. R. de la Sizeranne in La Photographie, est elle un Art? (Hachette). He marshals the pros and cons with vivacity, the conclusion of his interesting inquiry being (in rough translation):

As one walks through the long Gallery of the Candelabras at the Vatican, and looks over the heads of Hermes and the Furies, Silenus and Mercury, and of Diana of the Ephesians with ten breasts, and of the Satyr extracting a thorn from the foot of a Faun, to the ceilings painted during the present Pontificate, one notices a curious allegory. Science and Art, represented by figures ornamented by their attributes, do homage to Religion for permitting their progress, and well placed among these figures is Photography holding her horrible camera. One is surprised, not only that a Raphael and a Michael Angelo should be succeeded by such a mediocre decoration of ceilings, but that the allegorical goddess of collodium and bromide should stand proudly where, in the Sistine, one saw Sibyls and Prophets. Then one is reminded of the lines addressed to the Princess Isabel of Bavaria by Leo XIII., on L'Ars Photographica:

Naturæ Apelles æmulus Imaginem
Non pulchriorem pingeret;

and one asks oneself if what seems to be hyperbole to-day will not be truth to-morrow. What we have seen exhibited is not sufficient evidence for this prediction, but it is more than enough to make us hope it.

"What we have seen exhibited" is a large number of photographs by some of the principal living experts, Continental and English. The pictures are, in many cases, of great beauty, and all show dexterity in composition. We wish, however, that more landscapes had been given.

What "Rouge et Noir" does not know about gambling, in all its forms, cannot be particularly worth knowing.
Some nice stories are scattered through his new book, The Gambling World (Hutchinson). We like (in a discreet way) the story of the Spanish sharp Bianco, which "Rouge et Noir" abridges from Mr. Maskelyne's Sharps and Flats.
Bianco took note of the fact that Havana was the greatest gambling centre on earth. He purchased in Spain an enormous stock of playing-cards, and opening every pack with extreme delicacy of handling, he marked all the cards and closed the packs in so perfect a manner that they bore no trace of having been tampered with. The cards were then shipped to Havana and sold at prices which enabled them to crush all opposition. Bianco's cards were soon in every hotel, club, and gaming-house in the Cuban capital.
Then Bianco arrived. Of course he won everywhere. An entertaining book.

Fiction.

The Adventurers. By H. B. Marriott-Watson.
(Harpers. 6s.)

WHETHER it was the title, or something in the aspect of the cover, is difficult to determine. But when we picked up this book we had an impression that Mr. Marriott-Watson had decided to challenge Mr. Henty's supremacy as a writer for boys. The impression was strengthened as the paper-knife disclosed no sign of the tender passion, no mention even of a woman's name, but that of a nebulous and—to the reader—unnecessary housekeeper. Our mistake was apparent before we had read a dozen lines. For on the first page the author writes: "The discrepancy of my narrative with the period in history, the Victorian suavity, and the hum-drum character of daily events have sometimes since prevailed upon me in the compilation; and I feel, even now, upon the threshold of my story, constrained, as it were, to an apology for its anachronism." That is not the sort of sentence to attract a schoolboy. But we were glad to feel that we were again in the company of Dick Ryder's historian, and, foreseeing good entertainment, were not disappointed. It is the anachronism which gives the savour to the story. The problem Mr. Watson set himself to face was—how to combine the clash of steel, struggles upon castle-ramparts, ambushes, secret passages, highway robbery and murder with the "Victorian suavity and the hum-drum character of daily events." It is a problem that many weavers of stories are trying to solve. Put your characters in Barataria or Ruritania and you can do with them as you please. But in England the police are usually called in. Mr. Marriott-Watson solves the problem thus: He imagines a young barrister—Greatorex—who by a sudden chance inherits a castle in Wales. In the castle is a treasure of gold and jewels, hidden in a secret cellar by a Royalist in the seventeenth century. The existence of this treasure is known to several other people, who lay siege to the castle by plot, pistol, and poignard. Neither side, you see, can call in the police, for the treasure really belongs to neither, but to the Crown. And so the author eliminates the power of the law, and leaves the matter to be fought out with bullet and cold steel. There is plenty of rough and tumble work in the book—best of all, perhaps, a fight in the dark against the knife of the arch-villain, who, though a villain, never forgets that he is a valet. In such a story there must be, of course, gaps in probability. You may wonder why Greatorex and his friends, when they first came upon the treasure, did not fill their pockets with a few of the priceless jewels and take the next train to London and Attenborough's. But if they had we should have missed a deal of excitement; and Mr. Watson's heroes are too full-blooded to disappoint our lust for fighting. Nor would that other excellent scoundrel, Captain Lercombe, have had time to expiate an ill-spent life by a final act of self-sacrifice. The Adventurers is a really first-rate story of the cut-and-slash kind. Nor should we omit to commend the illustrations by Mr. Keller.

Idols. By William J. Locke.
(Lane. 6s.)

ON the face of it, Mr. Locke's new story is rather sensational. He gives us a murder, a suicide, a divorce; there are three marriages, whereof one is secret, and another bigamous. Incident, however, is but the scaffolding by means of which he would set out the characters of his creations. These are four: two men, the "idols," average clay-footed creatures; two women, put rather obtrusively at opposite poles of good and bad. Hugh Colman is beguiled by the bad woman into a situation which leaves him charged with a murder and tongue-tied from clearing himself. The good woman, Irene Merriam, saves him by committing perjury against her own fair fame. She believes that her own husband will understand; but he declines to do so, and divorces her. From this point the conduct of the story somewhat strains our sense of the plausible. Hugh Colman, previously married under the rose to the bad woman, shows his sense of gratitude by committing bigamy with Mrs. Merriam. Of course the thing comes to light, and a timely suicide makes a satisfactory conclusion. Mr. Locke has grip of strong emotional situations.

Absalom's Hair and A Painful Memory. By Björnstjerne Björnson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

A Painful Memory is the story of an unjust execution, and only occupies few pages. Absalom's Hair, published in 1894, is a more elaborate piece of work. Rafael Kaas is the son of a sporting savage who beats his wife, an audacious novelist with Titian hair. The story concerns itself with the general mess that he makes of life, with his relations to the right woman and the wrong, and with his estrangement from and reconciliation to his mother. Like all the author's work, it interests and repels.

Notes on Novels.

IN STORM AND STRIFE.

BY JEAN MIDDLEMASS.

The good old manner is here. For example: "At this moment an oath, strong and fierce, hissed through the summer air." Here, again, is the very stuff and cadence of the cheap novelette: "Lady Violet Fremantle as she stood on a bright August morning, in the rose garden at Coombe Castle, was a vision of joy and delight. A basketful of glorious specimens of the Queen of flowers was on her arm, a cluster of Gloires de Dijon was pinned into the front of her white bodice. A large sun-hat was set jauntily on the fair head, about which the natural curls would never allow themselves to be repressed by the coiffeur's art." (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

HORATIO.

BY HARLEY RODNEY.

Horatio's other name is Hopkins, and this novel is, in effect, his biography. Horatio seems to be a bad lot. Perhaps he reforms; but on p. 36 he is telling lies "in the most unnecessary manner" at Eton, on p. 59 he is introducing five old Oxford friends to a gambling hell for a sovereign a head, on p. 132 he has abstracted a bottle containing a new explosive from the laboratory of a Government official, and so on. (Digby, Long & Co. 3s. 6d.)

Lewis Carroll's Suppressed Booklets.

OUR title refers to half-a-dozen anonymous booklets in dull red covers with the imprint of James Parker & Co., Oxford. These "Notes by an Oxford Chiel," for such is the name they bear, are severally entitled: "The New Method of Evaluation as Applied to π "; "The Dynamics of a Parti-cle"; "Facts, Figures, and Fancies, Relating to the Elections to the Hebdomadal Council, the Offer of the Clarendon Trustees, and the Proposal to Convert the Parks into Cricket-Grounds"; "The New Belfry"; "The Vision of the Three T's: a Threnody"; and "The Blank Cheque."

Such are the squibs which, during the years 1865-1874, proceeded from the facile pen of the late Rev. Charles Lutwidge Dodgson, known to fame as "Lewis Carroll," the author of the immortal Alice in Wonderland. These little brochures, in which certain interesting and important University affairs are discussed with startling ingenuity and unfailing wit, have been scarcely known by the outside world, and, unless a reprint should be forthcoming, there is a possibility that soon only "Lewis Carroll" collectors and ardent book-fanciers will be aware that these evidences of a genius for eccentric originality ever existed. For some reason—perhaps because they failed to satisfy the more mature and grave mind of the author—Mr. Dodgson was led to withdraw every copy which the publishers had in their possession, and now the half-dozen original issues, in their wrappers, which were obtainable for three shillings, are marked at five guineas. Even copies of the second issues are selling for many times their published price. The writer is fortunate in possessing an author's set acquired at Mr. Dodgson's sale.

To those who, observing Mr. Dodgson in his relations with the University, saw in him the somewhat old-fashioned don, courteous and yet reserved, these facetious effusions, with all their clever word-juggling on current Oxford topics and events, revealed an entirely new side of his life. At every turn one is impressed with their brilliancy and aptness, and the admirer of "Lewis Carroll" who has them on his shelves is lucky. They were produced during those years of the author's life which witnessed his best achievements, and are simply inimitable. At least, it would be hard to find anything to equal them in their own particular line.

The first-named, sent out in 1865, the year of the publication of Alice, has reference to a question which had been demanding solution for years. As Regius Professor of Greek, Jowett had won great distinction. To each of the Regius Professorships a nominal salary of only forty pounds per annum was originally attached, but the stipend of every Regius Professor, with the exception of Jowett, had been considerably augmented by special University grants or other methods. When, however, the matter of Jowett's salary came before Convocation the clergy trooped to Oxford to refuse to one whose opinions they believed to be harmful, payment for excellent work with which those opinions had no real connexion. In 1863 Dr. Pusey and his friends commenced a prosecution of Jowett, and, in writing to the Times on the subject, Pusey defended himself because of the heresies of Essays and Reviews, with which publication Jowett was, of course, connected. Then, in 1864, the Oxford Convocation once more refused to pay Jowett his rightful salary, even though in this instance, as a matter of policy, Pusey and Keble recommended the grant; but not long after the question was settled. More extended reference to the dispute cannot here be made.

Mr. Dodgson's skit, "The Evaluation of π ," is wholly delightful, and, to be rightly appreciated, should be read in its entirety. Only extended quotation can do it the slightest justice. The introduction adequately explains itself:

The problem of evaluating π , which has engaged the attention of mathematicians from the earliest ages, had, down to our own time, been considered as purely arithmetical. It was reserved for this generation to make the discovery that it is in reality a dynamical problem, and the true value of π , which appeared an ignis fatuus to our forefathers, has been at last obtained under pressure.

The following are the main data of the problem: Let U = the University, G = Greek, and P = Professor. Then GP = Greek Professor; let this be reduced to its lowest terms, and call the result J (Jowett).

Also let W = the work done, T = the Times, p = the given payment, π = the payment according to T, and S = the sum required; so that $\pi = S$.

The problem is, to obtain a value for π which shall be commensurable with W.

In the early treatises on this subject, the mean value assigned to π will be found to be 40 000000. Later writers suspected that the decimal point had been accidentally shifted, and that the proper value was 400 000000; but, as the details of the process for obtaining it had been lost, no further progress was made in the subject till our own time, though several most ingenious methods were tried for solving the problem.

The methods, of which the author proceeds to give a brief account, are Rationalisation, the Method of Indifferences, Penrhyn's Method (Penrhyn refers to Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, afterwards Dean of Westminster), the Method of Elimination of J (Jowett), and "the great discovery of our own day, the Method of Evaluation under Pressure."

With what perfectly assumed seriousness, excellent fooling, and, withal, consummate ability is it done! How skilfully E and R (Essays and Reviews) are made to play their part, and EBP and HPL (Pusey and Liddon) introduced into the "Method of Indifferences." The writer proceeds:

It was now necessary to investigate the locus of EBP: this was found to be a species of Catenary, called the Patristic Catenary, which is usually defined as "passing through origin, and containing many multiple points." The locus of HPL will be found almost entirely to coincide with this.

But nothing, surely, can surpass the "Elimination of J," with its exquisite wit and sarcasm:

It had long been perceived that the chief obstacle to the evaluation of π was the presence of J, and in an earlier age of mathematics J would probably have been referred to rectangular axes, and divided into two unequal parts—a process of arbitrary elimination which is now considered not strictly legitimate.

It was proposed, therefore, to eliminate J by an appeal to the principle known as "the permanence of equivalent formularies." This, however, failed on application, as J became indeterminate. Some advocates of the process would have preferred that J should be eliminated "in toto." The classical scholar need hardly be reminded that "toto" is the ablative of "tutum," and that this beautiful and expressive phrase embodied the wish that J should be eliminated by a compulsory religious examination.

It was next proposed to eliminate J by means of a "canonisant." The chief objection to this process was, that it would raise J to an inconveniently high power, and would after all only give an irrational value for π .

One other method suggested was that π should be treated as a given quantity: this theory was supported by many eminent men at Cambridge and elsewhere; but, on application, J was found to exhibit a negative sign, which of course made the evaluation impossible.

The modern method of "Evaluation under Pressure," which was "crowned with brilliant and unexpected success," cannot here be given, but "there can be no doubt that the process has been correctly performed, and that the learned world may be congratulated on the final settlement of this most difficult problem." The entire pamphlet is in its way unsurpassable.

In the third of the series, "Facts, Figures, and Fancies," in his lines on "The Deserted Parks," a parody of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village," Mr. Dodgson thus refers to Prof. Jowett and his much debated salary:

A man he was to undergraduates dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year.
And so, I ween, he would have been till now,
Had not his friends ('twere long to tell you how)

Prevailed on him, Jack-Horner like, to try
Some method to evaluate his pie,
And win from those dark depths, with skilful thumb,
Five times a hundredweight of luscious plum—
Yet for no thirst of wealth, no love of praise,
In learned labour he consumed his days!"

The year 1865 also saw the issue of "The Dynamics of a Parti-cle," with its motto—

'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle, Should let itself be snuff'd out by an article.

The author's witty ingenuity now found a congenial theme in one of the most exciting events in the Oxford University of this century, the rejection of Mr. Gladstone in favour of Mr. Gathorne Hardy (afterwards Lord Cranbrook) as its Parliamentary representative, and any reference in book or paper to that event will be made more attractive by extracts from this smart brochure. Some of its definitions are well worth quoting:

PLAIN SUPERFICIALITY is the character of a speech, in which any two points being taken, the speaker is found to lie wholly with regard to those two points.

PLAIN ANGER is the inclination of two voters to one another, who meet together, but whose views are not in the same direction.

When a Proctor, meeting another Proctor, makes the votes on one side equal to those on the other, the feeling entertained by each side is called RIGHT ANGER.

When two parties, coming together, feel a Right Anger, each is said to be COMPLEMENTARY to the other (though, strictly speaking, this is very seldom the case).

OBTUSE ANGER is that which is greater than Right Anger.

There is a sly hit in the axiom:

Men who take a double in the same (term) are equal to anything.

The different methods of voting are as follows:

ALTERNANDO, as in the case of Mr. —, who voted for and against Mr. Gladstone, alternate elections.

INVERTENDO, as was done by Mr. —, who came all the way from Edinburgh to vote, handed in a blank voting-paper, and so went home rejoicing.

COMPONENDO, as was done by Mr. —, whose name appeared on both committees at once, whereby he got great praise from all men, by the space of one day.

DIVIDENDO, as in Mr. —'s case, who being sorely perplexed in his choice of candidates, voted for neither.

CONVERTENDO, as was wonderfully exemplified by Messrs. — and —, who held a long and fierce argument on the election, in which, at the end of two hours, each had vanquished and converted the other.

EX ÆQUALI IN PROPORTIONE PERTURBATÂ SEU INORDINATÂ, as in the election, when the result was for a long time equalised, and as it were held in the balance, by reason of those who had first voted on the one side seeking to pair off with those who had last arrived on the other side, and those who were last to vote on the one side being kept out by those who had first arrived on the other side, whereby, the entry to the Convocation House being blocked up, men could pass neither in nor out.

As to representation: "Magnitudes are algebraically represented by letters, men by men of letters, and so on."

Among the principal systems of representation is the "TRILINEAR—i.e., by means of a line which takes three different courses. Such a line is usually expressed by three letters, as W.E.G."

In his own unique fashion Mr. Dodgson thus treats of Differentiation :

The effect of Differentiation on a Particle is very remarkable, the first Differential being frequently of a greater value than the original Particle, and the second of less enlightenment.

For example, let L = "Leader," S = "Saturday," and then L.S. = "Leader in the Saturday," (a particle of no assignable value). Differentiating once, we get L.S.D., a function of great value. Similarly it will be found that, by taking the second Differential of an enlightened Particle (i.e., raising it to the Degree D.D.), the enlightenment becomes rapidly less. The effect is much increased by the addition of a C: in this case the enlightenment often vanishes altogether, and the Particle becomes conservative.

It should be observed that, whenever the symbol L is used to denote "Leader," it must be affected with the sign \pm : this serves to indicate that its action is sometimes positive and sometimes negative—some particles of this class having the property of drawing others after them (as "a Leader of an army"), and others of repelling them (as "a Leader of the Times").

From the propositions the following may be selected :

To find the value of a given Examiner. Example: A takes in 10 books in the Final Examination, and gets a 3rd Class; B takes in the Examiners, and gets a 2nd. Find the value of the Examiners in terms of books. Find also their value in terms in which no Examination is held.

To continue a given series. Example: A and B, who are respectively addicted to Fours and Fives, occupy the same set of rooms, which is always at Sixes and Sevens. Find the probable amount of reading done by A and B while the Eights are on."

The pamphlet closes with a demonstration of the "great Proposition on which the whole theory of Representation depends, namely: 'To remove a given Tangent from a given Circle and to bring another given Line into contact with it.'" In the diagram, UNIV is the circle, WEG is, of course, the tangent in contact, and GH the line ("called 'the base' by liberal mathematicians") not in contact with it. O (Oxford) is the centre of the circle, and I (Ireland) the point of its maximum illumination. "Now, so long as WEG preserves a perfectly straight course, GH cannot possibly come into contact with the circle, but if the force of illumination, acting along OI, cause it to bend, a partial revolution on the part of WEG and GH is effected, WEG ceases to touch the circle, and GH is immediately brought into contact with it. Q.E.F."

"The Vision of the Three T's," relating chiefly to the "beautifying of Thomas, his Quadrangle," was written in 1873. It is quite evident that the erection of the bell-tower at Christ Church, the alteration in the parapet adjoining the hall, and the new entrance to the Cathedral from Tom Quad, were bitterly resented by Mr. Dodgson. This, indeed, is the only skit in which the personal element may be deemed in any wise objectionable. The architect, Mr. George Bodley, figures as a lunatic under the slightly disguised name of Jeely, and the "Ten-chest," the "Trench," and the "Tunnel" are subjected to merciless banter. Mr. Gladstone is introduced in the "Ballad of the Wandering Burgess" as "Our Willio," and is represented as expressing his disgust in no mild language:

For as I'm true knight, a fouler sight
I'll never live to see.
Before I'd be the ruffian dark
Who planned this ghastly show,
I'd serve as secretary's clerk
To Ayrton or to Lowe.
Before I'd own the loathly thing
That Christ Church Quad reveals,
I'd serve as shoeblick's underling
To Odger and to Beales!

None of Mr. Dodgson's pamphlets is more difficult to summarise than this, and only a few disconnected sentences can be submitted. In the "Conference betwixt an Angler, a Hunter, and a Professor," Piscator thus describes the fish proper to University waters:

The Commoner kinds we may let pass: for though some of them be easily Plucked forth from the water, yet are they so slow, and withal have so little in them, that they are good for nothing, unless they be crammed up to the very eyes with such stuffing as comes readiest to hand. Of these the Stickle-back, a mighty slow fish, is chiefest, and along with him you may reckon the Fluke, and divers others: all these belong to the "Mullet" genus, and be good to play, though scarcely worth examination.

I will now say somewhat of the Nobler kinds, and chiefly of the Gold-fish, which is a species highly thought of, and much sought after in these parts, not only by men, but by divers birds, as, for example, the King-fishers: and note that wheresoever you shall see those birds assemble, and but few insects about, there shall you ever find the Gold fish most lively and richest in flavour; but wheresoever you perceive swarms of a certain gray fly, called the Dun-fly, there the Gold-fish are ever poorer in quality, and the King-fishers seldom seen.

A good Perch may sometimes be found hereabouts: but for a good fat Plaice (which is indeed but a magnified Perch) you may search these waters in vain. They that love such dainties must needs betake them to some distant Sea. . . .

Nowadays [says the Professor] all that is good comes from the German. Ask our men of science: they will tell you that any German book must needs surpass an English one. Aye, and even an English book, worth naught in this its native dress, shall become, when rendered into German, a valuable contribution to Science. . . . I'll amaze you yet more. No learned man doth now talk, or even so much as cough, save only in German. The time has been, I doubt not, when an honest English "Hem!" was held enough, both to clear the voice and rouse the attention of the company, but nowadays no man of science, that setteth any store by his good name, will cough otherwise than thus: "Ach! Euch! Auch!"

When the new entrance to the Cathedral is spoken of as a railway tunnel, and one says he sees no rails, the response is: "Patience, good Sir! For railing we look to the Public. The College doth but furnish sleepers." Of the "Bacchanalian Ode" at the end the following may be taken as a sample verse :

Here's to the Censors, who symbolise Sense,
Just as Mitres incorporate Might, Sir!
To the Bursar, who never expands the expense!
And the Readers, who always do right, Sir!
Tutor and Don,
Let them jog on!
I warrant they'll rival the centuries gone!

The booklet thus concludes :

Venator : "Oh me! Look you, Master! A fish, a fish!"

Piscator : "Then let us hook it." (They hook it.)

Classification of Women.

It is strange, as the correspondence still running in the Chronicle helps to prove, how few words there are in ordinary circulation nowadays to express the differentia of female disposition. The most generally used words—"lady," "woman," "girl," with the prefixes "Mrs." and "Miss"—show difference in quality or in age, without calling attention to any characteristic peculiarities of that quality or age, and they lack power in drawing even these broad distinctions. The word "female" is also used to introduce a new quality distinction, or rather the lack of it; "female" being to "woman" what "woman" is to "lady." "Girl," with its quality distinction "Miss," is merely the general term denoting youth; on marriage this grows into "woman" or "lady" as the case may be, and the "Miss" is exalted into "Mrs." If more delicate distinctions are needed to express peculiar disposition, special descriptive phrases have to be invented, and each new description depends on the conditions of the temper and on the peculiar line of thought of the person making it; as, for instance, the "dainty rogue in porcelain" of Mr. Meredith, or the unprintable but well-meant idioms of the ordinary slummer. There are no general expressions which at once explain condition, temperament, and manner, current among averagely educated people; unless we except "old cat," a term in general use among all classes. The English language, then, as at present spoken, seems insufficient, and the loss of what were formerly common expressions is a great one, and should be corrected.

These old words, which have almost entirely lapsed, such as "baggage," "hussy," "wench," and so forth, were for the most part used in the classification of the young female; the old were distinguished by such terms as "jade," "shrew," "virago," "witch," and others not generally used in polite society, but of these "jade" and "shrew" were also applied to youth. By such words were females almost entirely classified; for the current expressions of the present day, "Mrs." and "Miss," had very little value: they were the mere coppers of the extensive word-coinage of the old times. "Mistress" then stood indifferently for either "Mrs." or "Miss," and the word had then none of that peculiar flavour which it carries with it nowadays. In the "Merry Wives of Windsor" we have :

Slender : "Mistress Anne Page?"

These old-time expressions had, too, their own particular adjectives, the whole phrase fully explaining the type of woman. So "baggage" was associated with "coy," "wench" with "silly," and "minx" with "sly."

"Coy baggage" seemed to apply not merely to the modest and retiring maid—or "girl," as we should now say—but rather to one who made pretence of modesty, using it as an additional weapon of offence and as a new snare wherewith to decoy men into the net of her charms. For the expression infers considerable personal charm. Where the assumed modesty is unsupported by personal charm, and where the assumption is not, as it were, licensed by youth, "coy" becomes "sly," which is not so nice, and the "coy baggage," grown old enough to know better, becomes a "sly minx." "Wench" would seem to have been to some slight extent a term of reproach, originally applied to the country maid, unsophisticated, and wanting in that savoir faire so necessary in polite society. It would be used by the irate father to the daughter whose views on the subject of marriage were not in strict accordance with his own. If the father, either gaining his end, or perhaps giving way in the vain hope that the daughter might, after all, be able to look after herself, returned to good humour, "wench" would be softened down to "hussy," though the new term would still imply some slight reproach. As in The Double Dealer :

Sir Paul : "Ah, this eye, this left eye! This has done execution in its time, girl; why, thou hast my leer, hussy, just thy father's leer."

"Hussy" is also applied, like "hoyden," to the young maid, untrammelled, and as yet untroubled by her parent's views of marriage, in that she has not yet arrived at a marriageable age. "Jade" sometimes takes the place of "hussy," but in keeping with its original meaning. "A sorry hag" is applied more often to the married woman. To her also were applied the terms "virago" (an impudent, manlike woman), "shrew," and "witch," and into such might grow up the "coy baggage," and more generally the "sly minx."

As an example of what we lose nowadays in power of expression, here is a final quotation from Vanbrugh's Esop. Learchus is trying to persuade his daughter, who is already in love with another, to marry the hunch-backed but famous Esop :

Learchus : Look, look, look, how he gazes at her! Cupid's hard at work; I see that already. Slap : there, he hits him—if the wench would but do her part. But see, see, how the perverse young baggage stands biting her thumbs, and won't give him one kind glance. Ah, the sullen jade! Had it been a handsome, strong dog of five-and-twenty, she'd 'a' fallen a-coquetting on 't with every inch about her. My good lord does my daughter too much honour. Ah, that the wench would but do her part! "Hark you, hussy."

Names to Conjure With.

WE are easily bewitched by the magic of names. In many cases there is a definite association of ideas linked with these sounds of "gramarye." But perhaps the strongest spell is cast by the names that touch the most lightly upon our conscious memories, and of this kind I find none more potent than those that crowd the histories of Sir Thomas Malory. To begin with, the very atmosphere of his book is "a sleep and a forgetting," through which images are seen as upon the surface of a lake—bright indeed, but with the wavering brightness of a dream.

His intangible cavaliers, although in a vague sense alive and akin to us, are yet remote and monumental as the effigies of Crusaders. Their trumpets clang with no earthly clangour: the notes are borne from planetary distances, and reach us alien as the light of Arcturus. But the pomp and glamour of their names! They subdue and dazzle and bewilder like the thronging banners of mediæval triumphs, "innumerable of stains and dyes, and blushing with the blood of queens and kings": Urience of Gore, and the crowned Anguish of Ireland; the King of the Strait Marches, and his brother of Listenoyse; Sir Melion of the Mountain, clean of thew; and Sir Pelles, neighboured with sacred glory, "nigh cousin unto Joseph of Arimathy"!

Thick and thicker still they press: Sir Gringamor; Sir Sagramore le Desirous, of the wandering eye; Sir Persaunt of Ind; Sir Briant de la Forest Savage, whose brown helm is wreathed with oak leaves; Sir Palomides the Saracen; Sir Griflet le Fise de Dieu; Sir Breuse Saunce Pitie; "the knight that was hight Melodias"; keen Sir Froll of the Outer Isles; with Sir Carados of the Dolourous Tower, and Sir Galahault the Haughty Prince. And these are but the vanguard of the array! Here is a pageant more sumptuous than the Triumph of Maximilian.

The Merry Monarch.

WHILE looking through Bell's Songs from the Dramatists, the other day, I lighted upon Shirley's fine dirge, "No Armour against Fate," from his "Contention of Ajax and Ulysses," and I was surprised to find a footnote stating it to have been the favourite song of Charles the Second. Yet, after all, why not? Of its kind, the poem is among the best in the language, and Charles was ever a good critic: while the poet's attitude was the king's too. The paradox of monarchy amused him continually: he knew better than anyone that he was not the best man in the realm. Again, Charles was a rake, and it takes a rake to appreciate fully a reminder of the necessary end of all things. None so impressed as he; none so fearful and yet so willing to hug the hint. This is the song:

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings:
Sceptre and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill;
But their strong nerves at last must yield;
They tame but one another still:

Early or late,

They stoop to fate,

And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,

Then boast no more your mighty deeds;

Upon Death's purple altar now

See, where the victor-victim bleeds:

Your heads must come

To the cold tomb.

Only the actions of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in their dust.

Ninety-eight out of every casual hundred people that were asked, would attribute the concluding couplet to Shakespeare. T. L.

Things Seen.

Dandies.

ON the evening of Christmas Day I allowed the bells of St. Paul's to draw me into the City. The moon was riding high between the bell tower and the clock tower, and as I crossed the space in front of the Cathedral it rushed toward the dome and flashed behind the Cross. All was quiet as a village. A few people groped up the great steps to where a single oil lamp, gleaming among Wren's enormous pillars, showed wayfarers where they might have shelter and psalms. The bells dropped into their final ding-dong—so gently importunate. Not a cab, not an omnibus; nothing but the chill warehouses standing around, awkwardly, like children whose game is broken.

I walked down Ludgate-hill. At least one could see London. The gradient of Fleet-street was revealed, and its antique curve. Not a light on Blackfriars Bridge was intercepted: one saw the bridge and felt the river. The people? A few "couples." A policeman. An old man who wheeled a "hokey-pokey" barrow and had all Fleet-street to himself, but no hope. Suddenly in front of me two young men—such pretty fellows! They belonged to one of the great shops in St. Paul's-churchyard, and had left their barracks for a stroll. Their mates were scattered to the counties far away. No firelight or nuts for these two; so they had come out to be seen at any cost. All this was written in the backs of their frock-coats, in the scarce perceptible tilt of their tall hats. They scorned overcoats—with such figures and such fits! They would not even wear their gloves, but carried them new and flat as they had come from the box. Their white spats teased my vision, and their heads moved in dreadful unison. I declare they were the only intelligible and self-centred people abroad. They were happy in all that solitude, for if there were few to see them they could at least see each other. And as they faded westward they filled me with more rapture than St. Paul's.

For Foreign Service.

At every door of the train was a little knot of red-coats and at each carriage window a head or two was thrust out. Half-way down the platform, opposite the middle of the train, was the band. Suddenly the bandmaster ordered attention, the guard blew his whistle, and as the engine uttered its first snorts the music of "Auld Lang Syne" broke forth:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And never brought to min',
Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And days o' lang syne?

The train moved with almost sympathetic slowness; at every window crowded the travellers, leaning out, waving, calling good-byes; their comrades on the platform waved and called in return; and the sonorous, melancholy air filled the great station:

For auld lang syne, my dear,
For auld lang syne,
We'll tak' a cup o' kindness yet
For auld lang syne.

As far as the train was in sight red sleeves waved from its windows. In three minutes the train was out of sight. With dreadful promptitude the band ceased playing and hastened to the refreshment room. The last thing I saw was a cornet and a bassoon jammed in the doorway. India must be ruled, but the routine of thirst cannot be interrupted.

Loneliness.

WE were all pulling crackers one with another at our table in the corner of the big dining-room, and crowning ourselves with paper absurdities. For it was Christmas and Brighton, and the hotel manager had festooned the dessert dishes with crackers. The clink of glass, the rattle of chatter, the ripple of laughter, rising now and again to a yell of merriment—and a sudden silence seemed to fall as I looked into the mirror in front of me.

"Why are you so solemn?" my companion asked, leaning over the table.

I looked past her laughing face, crowned with a tissue helmet, over her shoulder into the mirror, in which I could see a section of the long table running down the middle of the room. A lonely woman, middle-aged, with thin hair turning grey, had picked a cracker from the dish before her; she looked to right and left, and then, taking her cracker in both hands, she furtively pulled it—under the table.

My Mistress.

I LIVE a life apart from other men
And so know joys beyond the common ken;
While they press on and never reach their goal,
Here, in a garret, I possess my soul.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE feature of the Private Views at the end of last week was not to be found where it is usually sought—in the presence of this or that celebrity who goes through the Gallery neither specially attracted to nor recoiling from the works upon the walls. Not that the usual people and episodes of interest were wanting. The Bishop of Rochester wandered among the Rembrandts at Burlington House; and Count Deym greeted the Chinese Ambassador. Several Dowagers, whom Rembrandt would have been happy to paint—Lady Westbury and Lady Haldon of the number—were there, as well as younger women, including Lady Haliburton, Lady Romney, Lady Headfort, Lady Colin Campbell, and Lady Carew. But these were not the sight of sights. That was supplied, to my eyes, at the New Gallery by the Duke of Cambridge's ranging round the rooms lined with the works of Sir Edward Burne Jones.

THE Duke came straight from lunch, and was in the best of spirits as he entered the large room. But his spirits seemed to evaporate as he progressed, and the smile with which he set forth had no ghost of it remaining by the time he left the Gallery, for the first time, as it seemed, a man who had been worsted. The typical British Field-Marshal, brought up on Leslie and rising to a climax of admiration before Landseer, whose pride in our own "British School" was part of his patriotism—what could he do in a gallery of paintings borrowing their inspiration from mediæval Italy, a gallery in which the politeness due from a guest to the taste of his hosts forbade any explosion of expletives? It was found necessary, the day after, to recoup the Duke's exhausted faith in the future of British Art by a visit to Mr. Caton Woodville's "Charge of the 21st Lancers at Omdurman."

THE prediction, made in this column, that Sir Henry Hawkins would find his name down for a peerage in the New Year Honours List has been fulfilled. The fact is, that at the Jubilee Sir Henry allowed the Lord Chancellor to understand that he would retire with a coronet, but the hint was not taken. Recent events have led the Lord Chancellor to take a different course, and Lord Hawkins has his ambition—no mean one either. The fact is, that though an octogenarian, Lord Hawkins has full possession of his acute powers; and the wrench of his retirement from the long exercise of judicial functions will be eased a little by occasional sittings among the legal Lords in cases of appeal.

THE name of Sir Philip Currie among new peers will give pleasure to a large circle of his own and of his wife's friends outside the ranks of diplomacy. Sir Philip, before he became so occupied with "affairs," was a diligent reader. No other man knows his Thackeray better, or his Dickens so well. With poetry, in which his tastes are perhaps a little old-fashioned, he has a wide acquaintance; and it was by her verse that he first admired the lady, then known in society as Mrs. Singleton, and in literature as "Violet Fane," who now shares his name and its new honours. Mrs. Singleton, twenty years ago, was the centre of a large circle of literary friends. In the early days of the World, Mr. Edmund Yates was suppliant for all he could get from her pen; and she was one of the first discoverers of the talent of Mr. W. H. Mallock, fresh from Oxford, whose appreciation of her own turn of piquant talk has left its easily detected traces in some of his published pages. Lady Currie has not been so industrious with her pen as was Mrs. Singleton; still, she has not any final intention to put it down. Lord Beaconsfield used to compare the House of Commons to Don Juan and the House of Lords to Paradise Lost. Perhaps the association of ideas will lead Lady Currie, whose verse has been nothing if not Don Juanish hitherto, to attempt a graver manner. There is no doubt that had Byron lived long enough, by the natural law of reaction he would have taken his place by Dr. Watts as a writer of hymns.

THERE is a great deal of talk in nearly every case in the Law Courts about the sacrosanct secrecy of communications between lawyer and client. No doubt, the rule is a necessary one in the case of a guilty man on his defence, though its extension to witnesses—say, in a divorce case—who are giving bogus evidence which varies absolutely in its final version from the first they gave to the lawyer who uses them, is a scandal which clamours for suppression. In one or two minor ways, however, this doctrine of the absolutely sacred and confidential nature of the relations between solicitor and client is capable of a little more stringent application. For instance, when one reads the contents of the will of Mr. Christopher Sykes, communicated to the Press this week, one wonders whether the substitution of the name of the Prince of Wales for that of Lord Rosebery as the inheritor of a racing cup won by the late Sir Tatton Sykes was intended for publication by the testator. Probably not. For the idea that his first thoughts were for Lord Rosebery will be likely to take a little gilt from the cup when it goes to the choice of the testator's second thoughts; and Lord Rosebery himself may easily be forgiven a certain sensitiveness in being apparently set aside. One can imagine, at the next meeting between them, the Prince saying: "You can take it if you like," and Lord Rosebery making a negative reply neater than it is quite easy to put into his mouth in a moment. The fact is, that trivial as the incident is, it is worth noticing as the occasion for a protest against the publication, not of the bequests a man has made (which some people think in itself a slight intrusion), but of the bequests he thought of making, but did not make. It is adding insult to injury when you leave a man nothing to tell the world that you once meant to make him your heir; and even the inheritor himself may well, as in this case, protest that the cup would be far more welcome to him did it not contain these superfluous drops of bitterness.

THE marriage of the Hon. Nevill Lytton and Miss Judith Blunt will take place in Cairo on the first day of next month.

THE presence of Mr. Coningsby Disraeli at meetings held in county Bucks in support of the candidature of the Hon. Walter Rothschild keeps in association two names that can never now be disallied. Lord Beaconsfield had no prouder moment than when he made a member of this great house of his own race a British peer. His personal relations with the members of the family were always a pleasure to him. From the Sidonia of Coningsby to the Neuchatels of Endymion he made the Rothschilds live in his pages; and it is in Rothschild's strong-room that his own papers and letters now lie—the most precious deposit even Rothschild's strong-room ever had.

It is common enough for America to be sensitive about travellers' tales; and the hospitality the Republic extends to the stranger within her gates gives her, in truth, a claim on his when he goes home and publishes his impressions. But now it is the turn of Italy to talk about a breach of hospitality, and to hurl the phrase at the head of an American, Mr. Marion Crawford. That is just a little ridiculous; for Mr. Marion Crawford is no mere visitor to Italy, but can speak almost as one of her own sons. His father, Thomas Crawford, sculptor, lived in Rome from 1837 until 1857, and he himself was born in Tuscany in 1854. Most of his youth was spent in Rome, and his education was completed at the University there. When he married, rather early, he settled near Naples, and there he still abides, on his own small estate. It seems absurd, therefore, to deny to Mr. Crawford the liberty of speech of a native when, in a letter to a New York paper, he speaks of the taxation and the other social conditions of Italy. The great offence taken is with his statement that King Humbert is not an Italian; and that does seem needless hair-splitting. Savoy is not Italy, of course. But neither, at that rate, was Buonaparte a Frenchman; and we have our own House of Hanover, and Hanover is not England.

The Book Market.

A Catalogue of Men.

THE new volume of the Post Office Directory bears on its fat red back the proud words "100th Edition." Within we find an historical "Note," and also a facsimile of a map of London published in 1799. The contrast between this map and the new frontispiece map for 1899 is one which might be studied in detail for many hours without weariness, but we cannot dwell on this subject. It is more to the point to set down in outline the history of a book which, in its own way, and, indeed, from several points of view, may claim to be the most wonderful book in the world. A representative of the ACADEMY has catechised Mr. Kelly thus:

"What is the precise meaning, Mr. Kelly, of the statement that this is the 100th edition of the Post Office Directory?"

"Well, it does not mean, of course, that we have issued it ourselves for one hundred years. The Directory took its rise in the old Lombard-street General Post Office a century ago. It passed into our hands some forty years later. You would like the whole story? In the thirties my father was offered the post of Inspector-General of Letter Carriers. That was in the days of the old twopenny postmen, who went about the streets with their bells collecting and delivering letters and taking their fees. My father accepted the post, and he found that he was expected to buy the copyright of the Post Office Directory from his predecessor. That will appear to you to be a curious proceeding. But the Directory, such as it was, was then compiled by the Letter Carriers, and its sale and the profits arising therefrom were vested in the Inspector-General of Letter Carriers. The Carriers made something by acting as agents for the book, and the Inspector-General was not expected to account to the Post Office for his fairly large receipts. Well, this was an anomalous state of affairs, and a certain Member of Parliament brought in a Bill to end it. The result was that the post of Inspector-General of Letter Carriers was abolished, and my father walked out of her Majesty's Post Office—with the Directory."

"With the Directory?"

"Certainly. For, as his post was abolished, he had no successor who could claim the right to purchase it. He was its last and, therefore, its permanent possessor."

"And that is how the Post Office Directory became 'Kelly's'?"

"Yes. Mind you, at that time there were two private Directories distinctly better than the P.O., but my father immediately saw the value of the title, and of the prestige that went with it, and he set to work to develop the derelict."

"Then, Mr. Kelly, taking its growth for granted, how do you maintain the Directory and ensure its accuracy?"

"It could not be done but by trained men, and an exact organisation. With these it is simple enough. So many districts—a man to each—paper slips—a 'clearing' of these in our offices—and so bit by bit (and all within the space of two or three months) each new Directory takes shape. Of course we receive great assistance in proof-reading from interested parties. The Government offices correct our lists of their officials regularly."

"Does your work undergo any interesting changes as years go on? The Directory is surely a delicate social barometer?"

"Well, we notice one thing—the growth of flats. I remember when we were told that English people would never adopt the flat system, would never 'feel at home' in anything but a house. And the first flats waited long for tenants. But now! . . ."

"Our difficulty? Well, you talk of an Englishman's house being his castle, but commend me to his flat as the more impregnable fortress. What with the janitor who intercepts our canvassers at every entrance, like Cerberus, and the ease with which your flat-tenant skips whither he will, leaving his flat dumb and empty, we have great difficulty in completing some of our lists."

"About how much correction does the Directory require from year to year?"

"I calculate that one name in seven or eight needs correction. This proportion means the alteration of many thousands of names. Our aim and tradition are accuracy. The alteration of a firm's style may mean only the addition of 'Ltd.' or the substitution of 'Mrs' for 'Mr.' but these things have to be looked after with vigilance."

Correspondence.

"Lithography and Lithographers."

SIR,—I have neither the time nor the intention to devote myself to the education of your critic; but I must ask you to allow me to contradict flatly three of his statements, and to answer the query he sees fit to put me.

(1) I have never made a "verbal distinction" between lithographs on paper and lithographs on stone. All are "lithographs proper." This was settled by Aloys Senefelder one hundred years ago. In a technical book one gives technical examples of technical methods.

(2) No technical point was involved in the legal case to which he refers.

(3) Most artists and printers, I know anything about, have turned their attention to the preparation of a paper with a surface that does not represent the texture of stone.

(4) Lithography, Senefelder defined to be chemical or surface printing. I prefer Senefelder to your critic as an authority.

I do not hope to convince your critic, for, as he has reviewed our book and, in so doing, proved himself incapable of understanding it, the task would be hopeless. If he would like any further explanation on these very points, I would refer him to the Saturday Review of December 24, 1898.—I am, &c.,

JOSEPH PENNELL.

Jan. 2, 1899.

[Our reviewer writes: "It is not my wish to trespass on Mr. Pennell's invaluable time more than is needful to reply to his letter.

(1) He himself allows that 'in a technical book one gives technical examples of technical methods.' And when, as in the present case, those methods happen to be different, a distinction in words referring to them is entailed. To demonstrate my point there is no need to go beyond the list of illustrations, which are differentiated in several ways. Some are specifically described as drawn on stone or zinc, and others again on paper, and thence transferred to stone.

(2) It cannot seriously admit of denial that a technical point was involved in the case of 'Pennell v. Sickert,' in view of the number of experts called to give evidence.

(3) I never asserted that stone-grained paper is invariably used by all lithographers who adopt the transfer method. Mr. Pennell acknowledges that it is used by some of them; and, be they proportionately many or few, they all belong to Mr. Pennell's party, as distinguished from those who believe that a true lithograph implies drawing on the stone direct. The latter have no occasion to use transfer paper at all, grained or otherwise.

(4) The statement to which I took exception—viz., that 'the whole art of lithography is surface printing'—is not one of Senefelder's, but a gloss of the author's own, inserted in an Anglicised excerpt from Senefelder. Mr. Pennell may be right in accusing me of ignorance in a great many respects, if he pleases, but, at any rate, I have been taught enough Greek to understand that the word 'Lithography' means 'stone drawing,' and not even the authority of Senefelder himself can persuade me that it means any such thing as a drawing made upon paper, to be ultimately plastered face downwards on to stone."—THE REVIEWER.]

"The Book of the Master."

SIR,—In the remarkable article with which you have favoured me, you are so good as to say that my "literary method" is "gravely reprehensible," and that "from a scientific standpoint" my work is "beneath consideration." Be it so. Such judgments are matter of opinion which it is not for the author to dispute.

But gross and material mis-statements of fact are in a different category. And when your correspondent declares that my theory of a connexion between the Book of the Dead and the construction of the Pyramid is, "to anyone having the slightest acquaintance with Egyptology, inconceivably absurd," and goes on to adduce the name of M. Maspero in support of this condemnation, he says that which he knows, or ought to know, to be the precise opposite of the truth. For Prof. Maspero himself not only supports this "inconceivably absurd" theory of mine, but informed me that the connexion of the Pyramid with the initiation into the secrets of the ancient religion was in accordance with a tradition which prevailed among the priests of Memphis. And this I have stated in my preface; though not, indeed, on the first page, but on the fourth.

Such literary methods, sir, appear to me to be "gravely reprehensible," and the criticism which results from them "beneath consideration." While as for a writer whose highest knowledge of Egyptology, according to his own showing, is Pierret's translation to condemn ex cathedra a theory which has received the endorsement of Prof. Maspero (and, I may add, of Prof. Sayce also; for he considers the analogy to be exceedingly striking)—well, I put it to you, is not such a pretension "inconceivably absurd"?—I am, &c.,

THE AUTHOR.

[Mr. Adams's letter is hardly to the point. He does not explain why he gave a wrong measurement for the base of the Great Pyramid, why his diagram of the interior differs from that made by competent surveyors, or why he garbled the translation of the only text quoted by him in support of his theory. I do not see how my comparison of M. Pierret's translation of this text with that of Mr. Adams's shows that my knowledge of Egyptology does not extend beyond it; but then I equally fail to see how Prof. Sayce's remark, that "the analogy" [query, of what with what?] is exceedingly striking, is an "endorsement" of Mr. Adams's book. That Prof. Maspero and Prof. Sayce may have used courteous expressions, into which Mr. Adams is now, after his manner, endeavouring to read a confirmation of his views, is likely enough; but until these great scholars defend it publicly I shall continue to believe that their opinion of Mr. Adams's book is the same as that of—YOUR REVIEWER.]

A New York Journalist.

SIR,—In the notes of "Bookworm," in your issue of November 12, reference is made to W. D. Howells's recent "pronouncement" upon American literature, in which he writes of Lowell, Whipple, and Ripley, closing with Dennett, whose "brilliancy, natural and acquired fitness" Howells thinks it would be difficult to match at the present day. "Bookworm" asks, "Who is Dennett? In not knowing him does one argue oneself unknown?" I think "Bookworm" is quite excusable in not knowing Dennett, though he was well worth knowing. He was a journalist of ability and distinction, whose writings upon current topics were pointed and incisive; but he would have ridiculed the classification of his writings with those of Lowell, though he might have endured, in kindness, being ranked with writers of the calibre of Whipple and Ripley. Dennett had a faculty of forming happy phrases which were accurately descriptive of certain situations or conditions of affairs. One of the most notable of these phrases, made at the time of the Beecher-Tilton scandal, was "chromo-civilisation." It was the heading of an article printed about 1873 in the New York Nation. For New Yorkers who had some knowledge of that dreary annex to New York City known as Brooklyn the phrase "chromo-civilisation" told the whole story. What Dennett wrote under that heading was a caustic notice of the queer people who flocked around Henry Ward Beecher, particularly those who were brought into public view at the Beecher-Tilton trial.

Brooklyn is inhabited, or occupied, largely by an unrelated and locally uninterested aggregation of human drift, mostly from the small towns in New England. Until the great bridge which connects it with Manhattan Island was completed it was chiefly noted for its eccentric preachers, and the extraordinary variety of its religious sects, to which new varieties were being constantly added. Dennett intended to make an extended study of the place, but I do not know that he executed his design.

My acquaintance with Dennett began in a public library, in New York City, which was in my charge. He was fond of looking over the new books, and one day I showed him a work called Chaucer's England, and also a notice of it in the Saturday Review, in which the volumes were described contemptuously as "tootle," a word not found in dictionaries. Dennett adopted the word, and in his talks with me about books he would sometimes throw aside a book as being "tootle," or commend it by saying, "No tootle there." Dennett was a gentleman, modest in mien, quietly cordial, with no tendency to gush or overstatement, either in talking or writing. He belonged to the great class of thoughtful men who make few or no books, but whose writings have a far wider, and more beneficent and permanent influence, than the "works" of hundreds of authors, in many volumes, which encumber our libraries, being neither materials of knowledge nor food for thought.

We have a disease in the United States which mostly affects librarians and has been called "bibliographomania." It is manifested in undue elaboration of the necessary work of cataloguing. It has, in some degree, been caused by belief in the foolish maxim—inapplicable to large public libraries—that a few books, elaborately indexed, are more useful than a large library without an index. The cost of this vast literary spoon-feeding system, applied largely to writings which have been superseded by the fruits of later and more accurate thought or research, is enormous, and has become too heavy a burden for many of our public libraries. Dennett once asked me how I would catalogue a library. I told him that if I could have a few assistants like himself, I would begin by forming two divisions, voices and echoes. He said he would like to assist in such a work.

Dennett himself was a voice, gently persuasive and effective; whose power was the result of his earnest and pure thinking, and had little to do with the “brilliancy” that Mr. Howells discovered in him.

“The Cruise of the ‘Cachalot.’”

SIR,—You will probably be prepared to hear that your splendid appreciation of my humble efforts in last week’s issue has touched me very deeply. Indeed, I am almost bewildered at the reception my first book has met with on all sides, but especially from so weighty an exponent of literary criticism as the ACADEMY. And because of this I am really glad of your question in the last paragraph, since it gives me this opportunity of expressing my thanks. I certainly did not use the adjective “clownish” in the sense of ungraceful, but I have always been highly diverted by the gambols of porpoises, so much so that I have had many a hearty laugh while watching them. As to my having read Paradise Regained, may I say that I have read many books of the same high class bought for a few pice from the old bookstalls in Indian ports when I was in my thirteenth and fourteenth years? I did not choose them, but because they were cheap I bought them, and afterwards was driven to read them for sheer lack of anything else whereon to feed my insatiable appetite for reading. For the ugly epithets “ill-used” and “bruising,” they are common expressions at sea, where a bluff-bowed ship that, instead of cleanly dividing the waves, thrusts them before her with a great noise and pother, is always called a “bruise-water.”

In thus offering my explanation, please believe that nothing is farther from my thought than complaint. My only idea is to send such a generous critic my assurance of how highly I have felt honoured by his most valuable remarks.—I am, &c,

FRANK T. BULLEN.

“It is Required,” &c.

SIR,—In the first page of last week’s ACADEMY is a paragraph in which the following words are in quotation marks: “It is required of ministers that they be found faithful.” Whence are they quoted? There are no such words in the New Testament as stated. The nearest are in 1 Cor. iv. 2.: “Moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful.” And in the Revised Version the words are much the same.—I am, &c.,

Book Reviews Reviewed.

The Books of the Year.

THE difficult task of estimating the quality of the books published in 1898 has been attempted in various quarters. We do not pretend to summarise the summaries; but a few gleanings from these deliverances will not be without interest.

Mr. W. P. James writes a thoughtful “Review of 1898” in the ST. JAMES’S GAZETTE.

In Poetry he thinks first of Mr. Meredith’s Odes in French History, so “packed with thought and imagery,” then of Mr. Hardy’s “deeply felt Wessex Poems,” and thirdly, Mr. A. E. Housman, whose poetry is “as real as his pessimism, which is no fashionable pose, but simple, strong, and sincere.” Mr. Davidson “is very much himself—his best as well as his worser self—in “The Last Ballad.” Mr. James points to the revival of Shakespearean biography and the problem of the Sonnets as distinctive of the year.

In Literary History and Criticism the best books have been: Mr. Beeching’s Pages from a Private Diary, Mr. Lucas’s Charles Lamb and the Lloyds, Mr. Stephen’s Studies of a Biographer, Mr. Gissing’s book on Dickens, and the new biographical editions of Thackeray and Burns.

In Fiction Mr. James names the novels one would expect. Of Aylwin he writes:

The romance has been acclaimed as a masterpiece in the most august critical quarters, and though “masterly” is the very last epithet that I should myself apply to it, its success is one on which Mr. Watts-Dunton may be very cordially congratulated, and one which is in many respects creditable to the public.

The success of Aylwin and The Forest Lovers seems to show the public ready for a new kind of sentiment and romance, welcomed as a relief, not only from the “realism” of the slum, but equally from the sentiment of the Kailyard and the romance of the second-hand cape and sword men.

Oddly enough, Mr. James omits to name Mr. Shaw’s Plays, a neglect which partly redeems by naming it first. The Globe summarist is emphatic on the merits of Mr. Crane’s and Mr. Conrad’s recent work, and he even delivers himself of the opinion that Mr. Conrad’s short story, “Youth,” is “infinitely the best story of the year, and is worthy to rank in the first bunch of the best short stories that exist.” Mr. Bullen is also favourably mentioned for his narrative, The Cruise of the “Cachalot.” As for The Forest Lovers:

People talk of the enthrallment of the detective yarn and the tale of hidden treasure, but this simple narrative—though conventional in most of its happenings—holds one like a vice. It has life of its own, and charm indescribable.

A sober view of 1898’s literature is that of

THE OUTLOOK:

If we apply two essential tests—creative power and the high serenity and poise which must always accompany the fit expression of it—the literature in the bookwork of 1898 will shrink to rather poor proportions. Even in interesting book-work, as distinct from absolute literature, the year’s productions are none too rich.

The writer ("W. P. R.") proceeds to discuss the books of the year in usual detail. We note a just tribute to Mr. T. W. H. Crosland's Literary Parables.

In a short leading article

THE DAILY NEWS

says that "the books of 1898, if they included no really great work, were unusually interesting and various in their character." The biographies of Bismarck, Lord Halifax, Mr. Parnell, Mirabeau, Mr. Lockwood, Shakespeare, Lewis Carroll, Henry Reeve, and the autobiographies of Mr. Joseph Arch and Lord Selborne are named first and in this order. "Of novels Helbeck of Bannisdale is perhaps the most successful, and Rupert of Hentzau the most amusing." Mr. Watts-Dunton's Aylwin is, "among other things, a remarkable picture of a society of Art and Letters which has passed away."

The Bookseller's view of 1898 is indicated by

THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

The year has hardly been one of great books. How many volumes has it given us which will be in circulation ten years hence? Perhaps it would be safe to say that the most notable book of the year has been Busch's Memoirs of Bismarck. With it one associates the Chancellor's own autobiography, only that work does not supply the same sprightly reading. Both books, being records of history, must have a permanent interest. Parnell's biography has been widely read, and that of Lewis Carroll was in high favour with Christmas book-buyers.

There has been no very extraordinary volume of poems. For sale, there has been no volume of fiction to beat Mr. Rudyard Kipling's Day's Work. Mrs. Humphry Ward's Helbeck of Bannisdale was a success of an earlier date in the year.

"Travel," said an observant bookseller, using a trade expression, "has been a strong department." He had in his mind especially Dr. Sven Hedin's book, Through Asia, which is still in large demand. The martial book has been falling on good soil recently, thanks to the stir of imperial politics. Mr. Stevens's With Kitchener to Khartum has sold edition after edition. Sir George Robertson's volume detailing the defence of Chitral Fort has also found its audience.

Finally, the Publisher's year is characterised by

in these terms:

From the publisher's point of view, 1898 has not distinguished itself. The stars in their courses have fought against it. War in the spring of the year, rumour of war in the autumn, and a political unrest prevailing more or less acutely throughout the whole twelve months, have combined to divert the mind of the public from literary interests and to check the enterprise of the trade by which these interests are provided for. On a retrospect such as we are here making, however, the peculiar history of the year which closes to-day has little effect. A year of commercial dulness for the publisher may be one of exceptional brilliancy among authors; and the general quality of its literature may be proportionally as much above as its quantity is below the average. Still, we can hardly console ourselves or the publishing world with that compensation in a retrospect of 1898.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 13.

LAST week we asked for alternative titles to nine works of fiction: Nicholas Nickleby, Tess of the D'Urbervilles, Children of the Ghetto, A Tramp Abroad, The Shaving of Shagpat, A Window in Thrums, Soldiers Three, The Open Question, and The Pilgrim's Progress. A number of answers have been sent in, some incorporating interesting suggestions. From them the following (approximately) ideal list has been compiled:

Nicholas Nickleby	"Dotheboys Done."
Tess of the D'Urbervilles ...	"A Soul in Gyves."
Children of the Ghetto	"Subject to the Law."
A Tramp Abroad	"Doing Europe."
The Shaving of Shagpat	"The Quest of the Identical."
A Window in Thrums	"From an Ingle Neuk."
Soldiers Three	"The Modern Musketeers."
The Open Question	"Love's Labour's Lost."
The Pilgrim's Progress	"In Search of Heaven."

Other variants are: for Nicholas Nickleby, "The Sorrows of Smike" and "Mr. Squeers"; for Tess, "A Woman of Honour," "A Code of Morals," and "The Sport of the Gods"; for Children of the Ghetto, "The Chosen People"; for A Tramp Abroad, "The Yankee Tourist" and "Uncle Sam's Grand Tour"; for The Shaving of Shagpat, "The Story of Shibli Bagarag," and "The Identical Graal"; for A Window in Thrums, "Other People's Business"; for Soldiers Three, "Behind the Tamarisks," "Barrack-room Tales," and "Off Parade"; for The Open Question, "The Blank Wall," "To Be or Not To Be," and (but this is a flippancy) "They Went to Sea in a Sieve, They Did"; and for The Pilgrim's Progress, "The Delectable Dream," and "The Warfare of a Soul." In a letter one competitor, A. L. S., suggests as another good alternative for Jude the Obscure, "The Case of Rebellious Susan." We have decided to award the prize to Miss Winifred F. Knox, 81, Pembroke-road, Dublin, for the following list:

Nicholas Nickleby	"The Usher of Dotheboys Hall."
Tess of the D'Urbervilles ...	"The Mill of the Gods."
Children of the Ghetto	"Subject to the Law."
A Tramp Abroad	"The Travelling Gent."
The Shaving of Shagpat	"The Quest of the Identical."
A Window in Thrums	"From an Ingle Neuk."
Soldiers Three	"The Modern Musketeers."
The Open Question	"Law or Reason."
The Pilgrim's Progress	"The Journey to the Celestial City."

To Miss Knox a cheque for a guinea has been sent.

Answers received also from A. L. S., Kensington; A. R. B., Great Malvern; D. V., Winchelsea; E. J. G., St. Ives; C. M. W., Meltham; D. S., London; H. B., Highgate; E. B. V. C., Streatham Hill; A. G., Cheltenham; H. P. B., Glasgow; F. B., Gravesend; J. L. H., Hampstead; A. B., Gartcosh; F. S., Belfast; M. A., Sale.

Competition No 14.

NOT necessarily with a view of enriching the language, but certainly in the interests of our readers, we ask this week for new words. Most families have a few pet words, of home-made manufacture, which often are far more expressive and picturesque than anything in Webster's unabridged. To the competitor who supplies the best list of four original words, with definitions attached, a cheque for a guinea will be sent.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, January 10. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 32.

The "Academy" Bureau.

Books in Manuscript.

An Offer to Authors.

THE Conductors of the Bureau established in connexion with the ACADEMY invite works in MS. for consideration. They have made arrangements by which a proposal for publication will be made for every MS. which, in their judgment, is sufficiently meritorious. No fee for reading and reporting, or for agency between author and publisher, will be charged unless a contract is arranged. The project was set forth more fully in our issues of October 8 and 15. Each MS. should be accompanied by an assumed name or initials, under which our criticism will be printed. The words "ACADEMY Bureau" must be marked on the wrapper, and the parcel accompanied by postage stamps for return if not accepted. It is to be distinctly understood that each MS. should contain enough to fill a volume, and that the proposal applies only to books that have not been published. The conductors of the Bureau will take every care of MSS. submitted to them, but will not be responsible for accidental loss. They cannot enter into correspondence with authors on the subject of books criticised in the Bureau, or as to completed agreements.

POACHING ADVENTURES.

BY "OUTLAW."

"Outlaw" glories in his occupation. He began poaching in Ireland, and continued in Kent and Surrey. He has certainly had an interesting career, and his autobiography bears the impress of truthfulness. "Outlaw's" attitude towards the Game Laws is one of hostility and contempt. We cannot quite understand the hostility. If game were not preserved the poacher's occupation would be gone. "Outlaw's" contempt is equally unphilosophical. At once he denounces what he calls "the battue" as unsportsmanlike and gleefully explains how he and his friends took pheasants by means of poisonous fumes. Also, he frequently mentions what were the cash values of the gang's achievements. These considerations oblige us to hold "Outlaw" as a thinker in very little respect. On the other hand, his chronicles, which are well written, have amused us much. They indicate a certain rude manliness which we find attractive. We hold the book over for consideration, and may possibly by next week have arranged a proposal for its publication.

A MISER'S HOUSE.

BY L. L.

This book chronicles a romance of humble people living in a village near Hounslow. We found it a little tedious in the earlier chapters. It was difficult to sustain our curiosity about the rats in the shop of Thomas. When we had reached the end, however, we realised that L. L.'s particularity in detail had an artistic design, and certainly it has an artistic effect. The story is original. Thomas had a most desirable sweet-heart; but he preferred money-making. His procedure towards getting rid of the lass is ingenious and told with skill. We were much pleased that the rats had the better of him eventually. That remark is a tribute to L. L.'s gift of story-telling. The book, indeed, is fresh and well written; but we are not sure that the public would think so favourably of it as the critics probably would. We hold it over for consideration.

IN THE HOUSE OF OTTMAN.

BY W. H.

This novel takes us into very high affairs. The hero is no less a person than the Sultan of Turkey. Only, he is not entitled to be. An Englishman, he had been a friend of a "Prince" of Turkey, who was "heir" to the throne of that stricken land. In a street brawl it became necessary that the "Prince," who was a weakling, should pass himself off as the Englishman while the Englishman posed as the "Prince." The deception had to be kept up, and the Englishman actually became the Sovereign. All through these great affairs there runs a love story, quite prettily told; but we are never thrilled. We admire W. H.'s cleverness, which has many aspects; but we can never for a moment overcome the feeling that the plot of his story is too grotesque. Publication of the novel, we feel sure, would bring him neither pleasure nor profit.

ESSAYS IN VERSE.

BY WINIFRED WALLIS.

Miss Wallis, as she herself affirms in one or two of these essays, frequently finds difficulty in the endeavour to express herself. She should not be discouraged on that account. Many poets have been in similar straits. Lord Tennyson, for example, studied the woodlands for hours in order to interpret to himself, and to his readers, what he saw there. Miss Wallis must be equally patient. Once or twice she is very nearly successful. For example, take this song:

Be thou my moon, and as the flood
So I to thee will sway,
Responsive to thy changing mood,
Thy pleasure to obey.
Be thou my sun, and I will pray
To be thy satellite,
From thee deriving all my day,
From lack of thee my night.
Be thou, when clouds assail my heaven,
My fixed perpetual star,
And through the rent the winds have riven
Shine steadfast from afar.

In most of the other pieces, however, Miss Wallis is vague and unconvincing. She has a pessimistic tone which we take to be less a real philosophic feeling than a symptom of her own consciousness that to be a blithe and successful minstrel is no easy matter. Her verses have much promise.

Announcements.

WHAT may be regarded as the first of a projected series of reproductions of prints and drawings in the University Galleries at Oxford is announced for immediate publication by the Clarendon Press. This is The Master E. S. and the Ars Moriendi, a chapter in the history of engraving during the fifteenth century, by Lionel Cust, Director of the National Portrait Gallery, with forty-six colotype facsimiles. Mr. Cust argues that the unique series of copperplate engravings at Oxford is the true editio princeps of the Ars Moriendi, and that the illustrations of the block-book in the British Museum are little more than enlarged copies.

THE making of a new Japan is one of the most impressive facts of our time, and it would be wonderful if this transition did not inspire some careful student to literary effort. We understand that Mr. J. Stafford Ransom, who was recently special correspondent of the Morning Post in the Far East, has in the press a work entitled Japan in Transition: a Study of the Progress, Policy, and Methods of the Japanese since their War with China. Mr. Ransom proposes to afford his readers the same insight into the position of the Japanese to-day as was afforded of the Chinese by Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun's remarkable work, China in Transformation. Mr. Ransom's book will be published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, and will be illustrated.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co. will have ready by the middle of January a new edition of Mr. E. A. Reynold-Ball's Mediterranean Winter Resorts.

MR. JOSEPH SHAYLOR's dainty little volume, The Pleasures of Literature and the Solace of Books, has run through a first edition, and Messrs. Gardner, Darton & Co. announce for immediate issue a second edition.

A NEW series of folk-tales, entitled the "European Folk-Tale" series, is about to be published by Mr. Elliot Stock, under the editorship of Miss F. Ethel Hynam. The collection will represent Russian, Mongolian, Slavonic, Polish, Bohemian, and Servian tales, each volume containing the tales of one country.

IN reviewing Mr. W. Drummond Norie's work, Loyal Lochaber, last week, we stated the price as one guinea. This was a mistake. The book is issued by Messrs. Morison at two prices, half-a-guinea and twenty-five shillings, and our commendations applied to the half-guinea edition.

THE long-looked-for Life of Sir Henry Keppell, Admiral of the Fleet, is now about to be published by Messrs. Macmillan, under the unpretentious title of A Sailor's Life.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. will publish in a few days a work on the Law and History of Copyright in Books, by Mr. Augustine Birrell.

The "Man Stories" of a Black Snake

By W. A. B.

With an Introduction by Captain MAURICE D. RELL, R.A.
"The author is keenly responsive to the potent influence of the hush, and able to transmit its weird charms into his pages."

"These snake stories are written by a close lover of nature."

"The stories are exceedingly graceful and full of suggestion."

"The stories are exceedingly readable and original."

"There is strong and original work to them."

THE LIFE OF HENRY DRUMMOND,
F.R.S.E. By GEORGE ADAM SMITH, D.D.,
LL.D., Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis, Free Church College, Glasgow. With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"The eloquent and popular author of 'Natural Law in the Spiritual World,' &c., has been fortunate in his biographer.
Dr. G. A. Smith has not only made the life-story of his hero interesting, but he has written a book which will be read with avidity for its own sake."—Daily News.

WORKS BY PROF. DRUMMOND.

THE IDEAL LIFE, and Other Unpublished Addresses. With Introductory Sketches by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D., and IAN MACLAREN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
Second Edition, completing 23,000.

"These addresses are written in a singularly beautiful style, and contain much beautiful thinking, showing that the writer had pondered deeply on some of the most spiritual aspects of religion. They will, we are sure, be much prized by the many admirers of their author."—Glasgow Herald.

THE ASCENT of MAN. Lowell
LECTURES. Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Seventh Edition, completing 29,000.

"Without being at all superficial, his book is one of the simplest and most popular ever written. He is one of the few who can make a complex scientific subject clear to any ordinary capacity, and attractive to anybody with a glimmer of imagination."—Daily News.

NATURAL LAW in the SPIRITUAL WORLD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Thirty-fifth Edition, completing 125,000.

TROPICAL AFRICA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Thirty-sixth Thousand.

"Prof. Drummond is a clear and accurate observer, and as he has had a sound scientific training, and has a real interest in the human side of African life, he is able to present us with pictures of a distinctness and originality not often met with in books of African travel."—Times.

THE LIFE of R. W. DALE, LL.D.,
of BIRMINGHAM. By his Son, A. W. W.
DALE, M.A. With Portrait. 8vo, cloth, 14s.

"This admirable and most filial biography.... Mr. A. W. W.
Dale has performed a very difficult task with great credit. He has told his father's story with excellent detachment, selfeffacement, and simplicity. There is none of the excess in praise which so often mars a biography written within the family."—Daily Chronicle.

PRINCIPAL REYNOLDS, OF CHESHUNT.

HENRY ROBERT REYNOLDS, D.D.,
His Life and Letters. Edited by his SISTERS.
With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 9s.

"Dr. Reynolds was a character well worth knowing beyond the range of those whom he touched personally, and many strangers might find their profit in turning over the pages of this memorial volume."—Manchester Guardian.

JOHN STOUGHTON, D.D. A Short
Record of a Long Life. By his DAUGHTER.
With 2 Photogravure Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"This beautiful memoir"—British Weekly.

ELEVENTH EDITION. COMPLETING 23,000.

CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY.
By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Miss Fowler has achieved a success as thoroughly gratifying to her readers as it must be to herself. The novel of the season will probably be the popular verdict upon this amazingly witty and brilliant story."—Speaker.

SECOND EDITION.

WAS CHRIST BORN at BETHLEHEM?
A Study in the Credibility of St. Luke. By Professor W. M. RAMSAY, D.C.L., LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The work is characterised by great earnestness as well as ability, while the learning which it displays is such as may be expected from one who has long made the topics discussed matters of special study for the pursuit of which he has also had special opportunities."—Scotsman.

IAN MACLAREN'S NEW WORK.

THIRD EDITION, COMPLETING 20,000.

AFTERWARDS, and Other Stories.

By IAN MACLAREN. Crown 8vo, art linen, 6s.

"Every story in the volume is delicately wrought.... The volume is worthy of the hand that gave us 'Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush.'"—Daily News.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

RABBI SAUNDERSON. With 12
Illustrations by A. S. Boyd. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"The character of Rabbi Sanderson is beautifully drawn
.... We commend the volume to a grateful circle of readers."—St. James's Gazette.

KATE CARNEGIE and those MINISTERS. Crown 8vo, art linen, 6s.

"It is in the character sketches of the story, in those ministers especially, that 'Kate Carnegie' is a notable book, and one in which Ian MacLaren has bettered the best work he had previously given us."—Daily Chronicle.

BESIDE the BONNIE BRIER BUSH.

Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s. Thirteenth Edition, completing 90,000.

"As fine an interpretation as we have as yet had of the real inner spirit and life of rural Scotland.... His pictures are marvels of idealistic realism."—Speaker.

THE DAYS of AULD LANG SYNE.

Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s. Fourth Edition, completing 60,000.

"Writers of genius have presented to us certain phases of Scottish rural character. Mr. Watson is almost unique in his power of revealing that curiously complex character in all its completeness. The characters in 'The Days of Auld Lang Syne' are as actual and real as it is possible for them to be in the printed pages. Their delineator has understood them all to the inner recesses of their being."—Daily News.

THE IAN MACLAREN YEAR BOOK.

Daily Readings from the Writings of IAN MAC-LAREN. Royal 32mo, in a neat small volume, 3s. 6d., cloth.

A DOCTOR of the OLD SCHOOL.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. With numerous illustrations by Frederick C. Gordon.

"An admirable and touching tale.... A nobler physician has never been described. He did his best for the need of all in cold and in heat, in dark and in light, through snowdrift and watercourse, without rest and without holiday, for forty years.
How he fought for the lives of his people for little pay, and often for none, and how he alone was ignorant that no one in the glen was so 'beloved as himself' is described with power and pathos.... The narrative is perfect."—Times.

WORKS BY J. M. BARRIE.

FIFTH EDITION, completing 43,000. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

MARGARET OGILVY. By her Son,
J. M. BARRIE. With Etched Portrait by Manasse.

"The readers of 'Margaret Ogilvy' will close the volume with a conviction that neither in history nor in literature has the mother of a man of genius ever been made so real, so tender, and beautiful as this."—Daily Chronicle.

SIXTEENTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

A WINDOW in THRUMS.

"The very best of the many good sketches of Scottish peasant life which we have ever read."—Standard.

ELEVENTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt
top, 6s.

AULD LIGHT IDYLLS.

"At once the most successful, the most truly literary, and the most realistic attempt that has been made to reproduce humile Scottish life."—Spectator.

EIGHTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

MY LADY NICOTINE

"A very delightful book."—Speaker.

ELEVENTH EDITION. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt
top, 6s.

WHEN a MAN'S SINGLE.

A Tale of Literary Life.

"From one end to the other the story is bright, cheerful, amusing."—Saturday Review.

BY W. J. DAWSON.

TABLE TALK with YOUNG MEN.

By W. J. DAWSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"A very good book to put into the hands of young men."—Times.

"A highly helpful and stimulating book."—Glasgow Herald.

BLACK ROCK: a Tale of the Selkirk. By RALPH CONNOR. With Introduction by Professor GEORGE ADAM SMITH,

LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"It has rarely been our good fortune to come across a book in which the freshest humour, the truest pathos, and the most exquisite tenderness are so freely displayed. Ralph Connor's story is real, his characters are real men and women, his parson is a real hero, and we are the better for making their acquaintance. There is not a lay figure in the book, nor a dull page. It is full of life, and tears, and laughter, and all the essence of good literature, as any novel we have seen this year."
—Literature.

"ONE OF THE BEST BOOKS OF THE YEAR."

MEGGOTSBRAE: Portraits and Memories. By HALLIDAY ROGERS. Crown

8vo, 5s.

"The sketches are altogether delightful; they are all of human interest."—Bradford Observer.

"Vigorous, kindly, and humorous."—Literary World.

"ENDLESS GOOD STORIES."—Times.

IRISH LIFE and CHARACTER. By

MICHAEL MACDONAGH. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

"A most readable and delightful book. We hope that it will have a very large circulation."—Irish Daily Independent.

"Of exciting books none that we know is more comprehensive than this.... We lay down the book after a great deal of entertainment."—Times.

"Will be read largely and read with delight.... Mr. Macdonagh is to be congratulated upon having written a book that is merry and wise."—Speaker.

BY J. H. MCCARTHY.

A SHORT HISTORY of the UNITED STATES. By JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"An excellent work.... We have little but praise for this book, which is well planned and written in an entertaining style."—Daily Chronicle.

SECOND EDITION.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON'S

EDINBURGH DAYS. By E. BLANTYRE
SIMPSON, Author of 'Sir James Y. Simpson.'
Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A book that cannot fail to interest."—Scotsman.

"Miss Simpson writes not only with knowledge, but with good taste. She says what she has to say judiciously. She helps to show what sort of man R. L. Stevenson really was, and those who concern themselves about the matter should be grateful to her."—Globe.

"A surprisingly fresh and unconventional book, written with insight, humour, and knowledge."—Leeds Mercury.

SECOND EDITION.

A HANDBOOK for LITERARY and

DEBATING SOCIETIES. Crown 8vo, cloth,
3s. 6d.

"It is marked by good sense and thoroughness throughout, and will be really useful, not only to members of the societies which it contemplates, but to teachers and others who wish to 'get up' subjects, especially as full references are given to books and periodicals in which the subjects are dealt with."
—Literature.

VIA DOMINI: Sermons for Christian

Seasons. By J. H. BERNARD, D.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; and Archbishop King's Lecturer in Divinity, Treasurer of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The book is well worth reading, as being the product of a mind that is reasonable and careful and thoroughly acquainted with modern developments. We commend it especially to ministers for its suggestive handling of questions which they are bound to face."—Literary World.

MESSRS.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED

AN IMPORTANT NEW BOOK OF TRAVEL,

By the Hon. DAVID W. CARNEGIE,

SPINIFEX and SAND. A Narrative of Five Years' Pioneering and Exploration in Western Australia. With Illustrations by Ernest Smythe and from Photographs, together with 4 Maps. Demy 8vo, cloth, price 21s.EXTRACTS FROM FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

"His record of its incidents and accidents has every quality that a narrative of this class should possess, and its well-sustained interest is enhanced by a large number of spirited drawings, photographs, and illustrated maps."—Daily Telegraph.

"The plain and honest record of a great achievement in exploration, bravely and modestly told as it was bravely and modestly undertaken. It is the story of the first penetration of the interior of West Australia from south to north and north to south—from Coolgardie to Kimberley and back."

*Daily Chronicle.THE LAND OF THE PIGMIES. By

Captain GUY BURROWS. Dedicated, by permission, to his Majesty the King of the Belgians. With Introduction by H. M. Stanley, M.P. Demy 8vo, cloth, with over 200 illustrations, 21s.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to authors like Captain Burrows, who, while presenting us with extremely valuable information concerning the peculiarities of these races, can do so in such a lucid, easily grasped, and attractive manner. The chapter on cannibalism is of great interest, and excellently written. We recommend everyone who is interested in the ethnological problems of African races to read it."—Daily Chronicle.

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. With many Full-Page Illustrations, Borders, and Initials, by GEORGE WOOLLS-CROFT RHEAD, R.E., FREDERICK A. RHEAD, and LOUIS RHEAD. Special Preface by the Rev. H. R. HAWES, M.A. Demy 4to, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN.

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Part I. 1766–1776.

By the Right Hon. SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, Bart.,

Author of "The Life and Letters of Lord Macanlay" and "The Early History of Charles James Fox."

8vo, 16s.

"That the work is able, deeply interesting, full of political insight and wisdom, expressed in admirable English style, no one who knows Sir George Trevelyan's writings needs to be told. It is indeed the best work on the American Revolution ever written by an Englishman. On reading it one almost fancies at times it must have been produced in the classic shade of the Boston Athenæum, so steeped is the author in the local colour of Massachusetts. . . . It is an old story, but one for ever profitable, and it is told here with a force and charm which it would be difficult to rival, impossible to surpass."—Daily Chronicle.

"The same brilliant style, the same happy wit, the same untiring industry, which rendered the 'Early History of Charles James Fox' a very kinematograph of English Society and its principal political figures when Fox first astonished it, have been extended to the soberer and simpler scene of the American Colonies when George III. provoked the American Revolution."—Daily News

"Nowhere are the contemporaneous events on both sides of the Atlantic which accelerated the catastrophe more clearly brought out than in this volume. Here and there are brilliant sketches of men and manners, and terse epigrammatic sayings, recalling pages, and these by no means the least effective, of the author's illustrious uncle."—Times.

MR. WM. HEINEMANN'S PUBLICATIONS.

LEONARDO DA VINCI: Artist, Thinker, and Man of Science. Authorised Translation from the French of EUGÈNE MÜNTZ, Member of the Institute of France, &c. Profusely Illustrated. Uniform in size with Michel's "Rembrandt." 2 vols., £2 2s. net.

Athenæum.—"The possession of such wide and solid acquaintance with his subject by an experienced writer like M. Müntz, induces the belief that the work will be well done, and the anticipation is fulfilled. The general reader will find a picture of the master skilfully placed before him, and the student will certainly recognise the good taste, sound judgment, learning, and industry displayed."

MARYSIENKA.—MARIE DE LA GRANGE D'ARQUIEN, QUEEN of POLAND, and WIFE of SOBIESKI, 1641-1716. By K. WALISZEWSKI, Author of "Peter the Great," &c. Translated by Lady MARY LOYD. With Portrait. 1 vol., 8vo, 12s. net. [This day.]

CATHERINE SFORZA. By Count Pier Pasolini. Abridged and Translated by PAUL SYLVESTER. Illustrated with numerous Reproductions of Original Pictures and Documents. 1 vol., demy 8vo, 16s.

Daily Telegraph.—"The quality of the book makes it bright and not too serious reading, while, at the same time, it gives us a faithful presentment of one of the most picturesque and tragic features of history."

A JOURNEY IN MOROCCO, MOGREB EL ACKSA. By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM. With a Portrait. In 1 vol., 8vo, 9s.

Scotsman.—"The author can be extremely shrewd, as well as witty and whimsical when he likes. It is, in short, one of the most amusing volumes of the season, written with an originality that almost approaches genius."

THE WORKERS: an Experiment in Reality.—The West. By WALTER A. WYCKOFF, Author of "The Workers—The East." With Illustrations. 1 vol., crown 8vo. [Jan. 20.]

A HISTORY OF SPANISH LITERATURE. By James FITZMAURICE-KELLY. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Literatures of the World.]

Spectator.—"The work before us is one which no student can henceforth neglect if he would keep his knowledge of Spanish up to date. We close with a renewed expression of admiration for this excellent manual; the style is marked and full of piquancy, the phrases dwell in the memory."

CAN WE DISARM? By J. McCabe and Georges Darien. 1 vol., 2s. 6d. [Jan. 18.]

TRELAWNY OF THE "WELLS": a Comedietta in Four Acts. By ARTHUR W. PINERO. Cloth, 2s. 6d.; paper, 1s. 6d. [Jan. 20.]

THE NEWEST SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

GLORIA MUNDI. By Harold FREDERIC. [Second Impression.]

Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Harold Frederic has here achieved a triumph of characterisation rare indeed in fiction, even in such fiction as is given us by our greatest."

TONY DRUM, A COCKNEY BOY. By EDWIN PUGH. With 10 Full-Page Illustrations in Colour from Designs by J. and W. Beggarstaff, and a Cover Design by William Nicholson.

Athenæum.—"There is much that is graphic, direct, and simple in Mr. Pugh's presentment of Tony, his sister, parents, and surroundings. . . . He shows that even the children of the slums have their short hour of irresponsible merriment. Tony's good heart and the early devotion of his sister Honor are given with life-like and touching traits."

THE TWO MAGICS. By HENRY JAMES. [Second Impression.]

Daily News.—"The first story shows Mr. James's subtlest characteristics, his supreme delicacy of touch, his surpassing mastery of the art of suggestion. The second story is a delightful comedietta, abounding in dialogue, swift, brilliant, polished."

THE WIDOWER. By W. E. NORRIS. [Second Impression.]

Times.—"The most copious criticism could really do little more than advise novel-readers by all means to read 'The Widower.' They will remain incredulous but amused. It is not a case of incredulus odi."

VIA LUCIS. By Kassandra VIVARIA.

Daily Telegraph.—"No one who reads these passages, in which the life of the spirit is so completely described, can doubt for an instant that the author is laying bare her soul's autobiography."

THE CHILD OF PLEASURE By GABRIELE D'ANNUNZIO.

Daily Mail.—"A powerful study of passion masterly of its kind."

"THE NOVEL OF THE HOUR."—Truth.

THE OPEN QUESTION.

By ELIZABETH ROBINS
(C. E. RAIMOND).

1 vol., 6s.

The Wiener Tageblatt says: "The latest female portrait in English literature, for which you may with confidence prophesy a niche in the Gallery of the Immortals, is contained in 'The Open Question.' The London Press has with no justification traced in 'The Open Question' the influence of Ibsen; the only thing that Elizabeth Robins has in common with Ibsen is her courage to approach as an artist the profoundest problems of life."

THE OPEN QUESTION.

The Athenæum.—"The 'Open Question' belongs to the limited class of valuable novels. Mrs. Gano is one of the most striking figures in the portrait gallery of latter-day fiction."

THE OPEN QUESTION.

The Standard.—"Concerning the ability of 'The Open Question,' there happily can be no doubt at all. It is a remarkable book; full of perception, of strong feeling, of passion that is far-seeing and kept well in hand; it shows descriptive power beyond the common, experience of life or close observation of it, and it is told in good, simple, and very human English."

THE OPEN QUESTION.

The St. James's Gazette.—"This is an extraordinarily fine novel. We have not for many years come across a serious novel of modern life which has so impressed our imagination or created such an instant conviction of the genius of its writer."

THE OPEN QUESTION.

The Daily Chronicle.—"There is a seriousness of purpose, an artist's genuine humility before his material, united to a rare sense of life and the play of strong hearts and souls, which make this a book of the moment. Mr. Raimond is to be congratulated. We have been deeply held by his work; we offer to him our grateful recognition of its innate excellences."

The Academy

A Weekly Review of Literature and Life.

No. 1393. Established 1869.

14 January, 1899.

Price Threepence
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

The Literary Week.

ON page 65 of this issue of the ACADEMY will be found the awards which, according to our custom, we make each January to authors of books of signal merit published during the preceding year. Last January, it will be remembered, we apportioned the sum of one hundred and fifty guineas at our disposal into two sums of hundred guineas and fifty guineas respectively. This year we have, for sufficient reasons, divided it into three sums of fifty guineas each.

MR. W. B. YEATS's project for establishing an Irish Literary Theatre in Dublin has been carried so far that the announcement of two plays to be performed in May is publicly made. These are Mr. Yeats's "Countess Kathleen," and "The Heather Field," a prose drama of modern Irish life, by Mr. Edward Martyn. We wish well to the scheme, but we cannot think the terminology very happy. A Literary Theatre has not too seductive a sound. Why not National? Anything rather than "Literary" would be welcome. Among Mr. Yeats's supporters are Lord Dufferin, Mr. Lecky, and Miss Jane Barlow.

"A. B. C. D.," the writer of the article in a recent Blackwood entitled "The Republic of Letters," which aroused Mr. Lang to a spirited reply in Longman's, was Mr. G. S. Street. The conclusion of Mr. Lang's reply was this: "If literary aspirants will kindly send their MSS. to 'A. B. C. D.' (care of Messrs. Blackwood, 45, George-street, Edinburgh), and leave me alone, I shall have every cause to invoke blessings on the head of the new dictator." We wonder how Mr. Street likes the prospect.

WE cannot disguise our feeling that Sir Walter Besant is becoming wearisome. We have toiled in vain after him in his gesticulatory onslaught on the publishers. And now, conscious, perhaps, of the boredom of his fellow-workers, he addresses himself in The Pen and the Book to the literary aspirant. We have the old accusations, and again those dreary balance-sheets. For our part, we solemnly declare that we had rather lead the literary life under the condition of being fleeced by publishers to the extent of £50 a year than wade through Sir Walter's balance-sheets, and take the endless precautions he recommends.

BUT we do not believe in these misdoings of the publishers. Publishers must necessarily be men of business; Sir Walter Besant seems to forget that the vast majority of authors are not men of business, and never will be. They waste the publishers' time to an incredible extent. Their fads and alterations, their conscienceless conscientiousness in the correction of proofs, their often feminine disregard of fixed arrangements and fixed times—these things add greatly to the cost of producing books. We do not find them noted in Sir Walter's balance-sheets; yet they may account in many instances for what Sir Walter Besant calls extortion and even (in capital letters) "thieving."

BUT in The Pen and the Book Sir Walter is not wholly engaged in poisoning the minds of would-be authors against established publishers. With all the certainty of being swindled which it offers, Sir Walter pronounces the literary life to be "by far the happiest life that the Lord has permitted mortal man to enjoy." If that be so, Sir Walter ought to be human enough to wish to keep it for himself and a few friends. He surely does not imagine that the greatest happiness of the greatest number will be secured by everyone turning author. Despite the cautions he gives, Sir Walter's book amounts to an invitation on the trombone to enter the literary booth. That booth is full enough already, and its doors are always besieged. We do not find lawyers inviting the crowd to their ranks, or the doctors, or the grocers.

FINALLY, we would remark that if The Pen and the Book is an ideally-issued volume—as we gather that it is, no middleman being concerned in it, no one but author and bookseller—we much prefer the products that reach us from Barabbas. We like six-shilling books to be well-printed.

THE Morning Post, we hear, is making arrangements to publish signed reviews of important new books.

IN reviewing Mr. F. R. Fowke's book, The Bayeux Tapestry, in our issue of December 17, we drew attention to Count Ostrorog's invention by which the "mesh" is eliminated from process blocks, thus avoiding "the chequered appearance so familiar and so distressing." In doing so, we inadvertently allowed it to be supposed that the illustration which we printed with the review embodied the good results of this new process. Such was not the case, and we point this out to those of our readers who, finding the mesh present, were unable to discover the improvement indicated. The block used did not exemplify Count Ostrorog's invention.

MR. LAURENCE HOUSMAN'S new volume of fairy stories, the successor to A Farm in Fairyland, is called The Field of Clover (Kegan Paul). Unlucky it came so hard upon Christmas that it missed the attention of the book-sellers, whose stock was then complete. But it will perhaps have some vogue now. Mr. Housman has, after his wont, illustrated the book as well as written it, and we reproduce his ingenious cover. The effect of the whole in black and white is better than in green and gold, the colours of the book itself.

WE have received a second letter from Mr. Adams on The Book of the Master—much too long to print. If Mr. Adams will look again at the review of which he complains, he will see that it was his whole statement as to the knowledge of the Egyptians that our reviewer considered absurd from an Egyptological point of view. We can insert no more correspondence on the matter.

WE have also received another letter from Mr. Pennell on the subject of Lithography and Lithographers, but this, too, is too lengthy for insertion. We are not prepared to reopen in our columns the interminable discussion as to what constitutes lithography proper, more especially as it seems to us that the point at issue is rather one of nomenclature than of anything else. No one pretends that the preliminary stages of the transfer process are identical with drawing on the stone direct. The only dispute is whether the printed result in the two cases is or is not entitled, strictly speaking, to be termed a lithograph. Mr. Pennell, indeed, musters an imposing array of names of artists who have employed the transfer method. At the same time, he does not maintain that any one of them claimed that what he did was precisely the same thing as drawing immediately upon the surface of the stone. Purists, no doubt, having regard to technique, will always insist on a precise discrimination; but, just as in the case of a stereotyped page and one printed from movable type, the results are so closely similar that there is scarcely need, in common parlance, to make any distinction.

MR. LANG'S Ballade of the Book-Hunter—baggy at the knees—is well known. For the House of Tregaskis Mr. Lionel Johnson has now written a kindred poem, more general in application, which we quote for its genial bookishness:

BALLADE OF THE CAXTON HEAD.

News! Good News! at the old year's end
Lovers of learning, come buy, come buy,
Now to old Holborn let bookmen wend,
Though the town be grimy, and grim the sky.
News! Good News! is our Christmas cry
For our feast of reason is richly spread:
And hungry bookmen may turn and try
The famous Sign of the Caxton Head.
Let moralists talk of the lifelong friend:
But books are the safest of friends, say I!
The best of good fellows will oft offend:
But books can never do wrong: for why?
To their lover's ear, and their lover's eye,
They are ever the same as in dear years fled:
And the choicest haunt, till you bid them fly,
The famous Sign of the Caxton Head.
In one true fellowship let them blend!
The delicate pages of Italy;
Foulis and Baskerville, bad to lend;
And the strong black letter of Germany:
Here rare French wouders of beauty lie,
Wrought by the daintiest of hands long dead:
All these are waiting, till you draw nigh
The famous Sign of the Caxton Head.

L'ENVOI.

Bookmen! whose pleasures can never die,
While books are written, and books are read:
For the honour of Caxton, pass not by
The famous Sign of the Caxton Head.

The ballade has lost the vogue that once it had, but for offices of this kind it is almost an ideal form.

In the catalogue which has Mr. Johnson's verses as introduction, there are two articles of interest to collectors of Dickensiana. One is the sun-dial from Gadshill Place, of which Dickens wrote to his daughter in 1859: "One of the balustrades of the destroyed old Rochester Bridge has been (very nicely) presented to me by the contractor for the works, and has been duly stone-masoned and set up on the lawn beside the house, I have ordered a sun-dial for the top of it, and it will be a very good object indeed." It subsequently passed into the hands of Mr. Crighton, of Rochester, who engraved these words upon it: "These relics from Gadshill Place and Old Rochester Bridge are placed here in sincere regard for Charles Dickens." The price asked for the sun-dial is eighty-five guineas.

THE other relic is Dickens's cigar-box. The catalogue (in the pretty way that catalogues have) remarks thereof: "The elegant casket shape is significant of the high esteem in which the novelist held the contents, especially from a social standpoint. Many a night has it witnessed from some close at hand post the conviviality of a brilliant circle that fraternised still more freely by an occasional visit to this fair shrine of My Lady Nicotine, and no doubt the owner often enough himself reverently and invitingly bore it round." For this thirty-two guineas is the figure.

THE Gladstone Memorial has advanced a stage further. The Daily News, which must be considered the first voice of Gladstonianism, makes the suggestion that on the site of the present iron building which holds St. Deiniol's Library a domed and galleried Memorial Hall shall be built, "whose windows shall shine in the rays of the sun, and reflect its glories far and wide"; and in this hall shall be stored not only St. Deiniol's books, but also other volumes innumerable, together with papers, pictures, objects of art, relics, and personal belongings of Mr. Gladstone. The whole is designed to form an objective for pilgrims, comparable with Abbotsford and Stratford-on-Avon. For the furtherance of the scheme, donations should be sent to the National Memorial Committee, 84, Mount-street, W.

THE report of the Belfast Free Public Library contains some interesting figures concerning the popularity of certain books. In the Lending Library Kinglake's Crimea has been taken out 147 times, Macaulay's England 79 times, and Lord Roberts's Forty-one Years in India 45 times; while the favourite novelists have been Mr. Crockett, Mr. Boothby, Mr. Conan Doyle, Mrs. Henry Wood, Mr. Manville Fenn, Mr. Le Queux, Mr. Seton Merriman, and Mrs. Annie S. Swan. The Reference Library figures are less illustrative, because the same persons may frequently ask for the same books many times. Grote's Greece stands very high. In the poetry section Browning comes first, and then Omar Kháyym, then Mr. Kipling, and then Chaucer. Among the people who have used the Reference Library we find 578 engineers, fitters, riveters, and platers, 1 tea planter, 90 actors, 308 artists and sculptors, 4 pawnbrokers, 104 constables, 163 publicans, 111 gentlemen (the Chronicle should be interested in this classification), 376 journalists, 6 authors and poets, 18 missionaries, and 2 phrenologists.

At the end of January Messrs. Duckworth & Co. will publish a volume of New Letters of Walter Savage Landor: Private and Public, edited by Stephen Wheeler. The publication of these letters is authorised by Lady Graves-Sawle, to whom most of the correspondence was addressed. The letters cover a period of twenty-five years, and are full of allusions to the political, literary, and social history of a quarter of a century, from 1838 to 1863. The second part contains a collection of letters on public affairs addressed by Landor to various newspapers and periodicals, but not included in any edition of his works. Several are now printed from proof-sheets, which he had himself preserved with a view to publication in book form. The illustrations consist of a characteristic portrait of Landor from a pen-and-ink sketch never before engraved, and two photogravures also hitherto unreproduced.

THE first volume of the publications of the Irish Texts Society, containing romantic tales of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, edited by Dr. Douglas Hyde, will be ready in March, 1899. In addition to the regular annual volumes, the Society will issue also, when funds permit, certain extra volumes containing more ancient texts. The first volume of this Mediæval Series will be ready about May, 1899, and will be forwarded to members free of charge. It will contain text and translation of the Feast of Bricrin (Fled Brierend), edited by George Henderson, M.A., Ph.D., from the copy preserved in the Leabhar nah Uidhre, with the conclusion from a version existing in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh (Gaelic MS. XI.); variants from Egerton 93 (British Museum), H. 3. 17 (Trinity College, Dublin), the Leyden University MS. Is. Vossii Codex lat. quarta No. 7, to be given when of essential service. This will be the first complete and critical edition, accompanied by an English translation, of this fine old romance, one of the most important of the ancient romantic tales of Ireland, after the Táin bó Cuailgne.

A VERY cordial appreciation of each other's actors and actresses has always distinguished England and America. From a pretty volume of verse, entitled The Song of Stradella, by Anna Gannon, which has just crossed the Atlantic, we take the following tribute to Miss Ellen Terry:

ELLEN TERRY.

Some say she is not human—
This strange elusive woman—
That she's some gay enchanting elf
From out the sea or sky:

But I

Believe she's just her gracious self.

Some ever praise the acting,
And others, all-exacting,
Her silences adore. But when She speaks her own free mind,

I find

She is the most attractive then.

Another generation
Shall list in veneration,
As all describe her haunting art,
And sing her merits high.

But I

Shall tell them of her gentle heart.

There is a suggestion here of Mr. Watson's lyric, printed in his Collected Poems, with its haunting lines:

But O her heart, when all is said,
Her woman's heart for me,

THE house in Fleet-street which was formerly called "Nando's Coffee House," and is now better known (erroneously, however) as the "Palace of King Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolsey" (such being the inscription it has long borne), is about to be pulled down. The house has other historical associations of great interest, and a very fine Jacobean ceiling. It was "Nando's" in the middle of the last century, and although its literary associations are not very clear or numerous, there can be no doubt that it was the resort of writers. Bernard Lintot, whose shop was next door, must have been seen here with his authors. His book-shop was known as "The Cross Keys and Cushion, next Nando's Coffee House, Temple Bar." Here he published Gay's Trivia. Oddly enough, Nando's is not mentioned by name in the Spectator, though it is referred to (we think) as "one of the most noted Temple Coffee-Houses" in No. 197. In his Pleaser's Guide, Anstey writes of a spendthrift:

Alas, how low his pocket grows!
He cruises oft at Will's and Joe's,
And oft, as many a greater man does,
Eats, drinks, and falls asleep at Nando's.

Shenstone, who was wealthy, could patronise the place with impunity; he writes in his sumptuous way: "I lodge between two coffee-houses, George's and Nando's, so that I partake of the expensiveness of both, as heretofore."

CONCERNING the clergy as novelists, Martin West, writing in the Church Gazette, says certain interesting things. "Most of the MSS. I have received from clerics," he remarks, "have been novels, pure undiluted novels, which did not make even the pretence of being religious. I remember one case. The author had a reputation for exact orthodoxy, and he was and is to my knowledge a cleric of extreme propriety of life. To my surprise his lucubration advocated not bigamy, nor polygamy, but trigamy, and he argued his case with a lucidity and power that astonished me. Possibly on account of their position the problem of the sexes specially appeals to clerical novel writers, and they are apt to treat it with a plainness very useful to the scientist, but at which publishers shudder."

THE clergy are as a class also very ready to review. We know this from our own experience, but Mr. West has exact figures to offer. He has been asking for information concerning their favourite subjects, with the result that eleven clergymen express a preference for novels, nine for history, nine for archaeology, seven for general literature, six for science, six for accurate theology, four for poetry, two for school books, one for devotional literature (which apparently differs from accurate theology), and none for sermons. One very able cleric, upon whom sermons were being pressed, replied to his editor: "I am willing to review anything except sermons. These I cannot conscientiously undertake. No clergyman has a right to review sermons. The layman who listens is the only person who can be just. I would suggest that you read them yourself."

A NEW weekly paper has just appeared under the title the Stable. As the name suggests, it is an organ for the owners of horses and carriages. It is illustrated, and is bright in tone. The first supplement represents the Earl of Lonsdale hunting the Woodland Pythchley.

THE January number of the Architectural Review contains the conclusion of the first of a series of articles on the castles of The Three Musketeers. The start was made with Pierrefonds, the chateau of the great Porthos (and Bazin). A plan is given, and there are impressive pictures of the battlements by Mr. Patten Wilson.

AUTHORS seek material in odd ways. The New York World tells the following story of Mark Twain:

The corporations controlling the street-cars of Berlin, in order to guard against being beaten out of an occasional fare, require the conductor to give each passenger a ticket, which is afterward collected by an inspector who boards the car at fixed points. The system struck Mark Twain, who chanced to be in Berlin recently, as funny, and, in order to test its efficiency, he paid his fare fifteen times in one day, throwing the ticket out of the window every time as soon as he had paid his fare. Each time he handed the conductor his fare he received one of the tickets, and when he had destroyed this he was each time required to pay his fare again to the inspector. The conductor watched this performance with unrestrained amazement, and the other occupants of the car seemed to think the foreigner well punished for his carelessness. The joke was not on the victim, however, for Mark Twain in this way collected material for a story for which he received 500 dollars.

Mark Twain may know his own business best, but it does not seem necessary to have experimented the full fifteen times.

THE boy poet whom the Chronicle discovered some two years ago, and for whom a patron was found willing to provide a good school in place of work in a rubber factory, is now again in the public eye. The patron, for reasons not given, decided to end the boy's education, wishing him instead to be apprenticed to a photographer. Canon Rawnsley, however, appealed to the Chronicle's readers against this project, with the result that a London publisher promised £100 to keep the poet at Keswick High School, where he now is. We observe that in one of the few poems which the boy has written since he was removed from Silvertown to cultured circles he cries:

But now the darker days are o'er
The springs of Song burst forth no more.

What boots it that my mind has grown
Serene and calm from comforts gained,
I'd sooner that my heart should moan
And still the power of Song remained.
Friends sympathetic, dear, are mine,
But where my soul and where the Nine?

Possibly it was after reading this lament that the revolt of the patron set in.

APPROPOS of boy poets, we extract from the British Museum volume of Autographs this week a portion of a letter from Thomas Chatterton concerning his intention, afterwards fulfilled, of committing suicide. There is no date,

Upon recollection, I don't know how Mr (Clayfield), would ~~not~~ come by his Letter, as I intended to have given him a Letter but did not. In regard to my Motives for the supposed madness, I shall observe that I keep no worse company than myself; I never drink to excess, and have, without vanity, too much sense to be attached, to the mercenary retailers of Iniquity. No!
 It is my Bride, my damned, native, unconquerable Bride, that plunges me into Distraction. You must know that the 19/20th of my Composition is Bride
 I must either live a Slave, a Servant; to have no Will of my own, no Sentiments of my own which I may freely declare as such; — or Die Perplexing Alternation! but it distracts me to think of it — I will endeavor to learn Humility, but it cannot be here. What it may cost me in the Trial Heaven knows! —

A LETTER OF THOMAS CHATTERTON'S.

but the document belongs to 1769. The circumstances under which the letter was written are explained in the following endorsement: "Mr. Lambert, Chatterton's master, found a letter on Chatterton's desk to Mr. Clayfield, telling 'his wants and distress,' and that 'on Clayfield's receiving that, he (Chatterton) should be no more.' This letter Mr. Lambert sent to Mr. Barrett; on which he sent for Chatterton, questioned him on the occasion in a very friendly manner, showed the horrible crime of suicide and the cursed principle he had adopted, and C[hatterton] afterwards sent Mr. B[arrett] this letter." Chatterton, in the letter, subscribed himself: "Your much obliged, unhappy, humble servant."

THE Chronicle has supplied its readers with a means for discovering whether they have or have not a sense of humour. It is necessary first to relate a story of a man at a dinner party who, on being served with salad, seized two handfuls and rubbed them into his hair. On being asked why he did so, he remarked that he thought it was spinach. The test is in the comments of the listeners to the anecdote. They have not humour, or they have it, according as they ask or do not ask why the man wanted to rub spinach in his hair.

The Mess Deck, a collection of humorous stories of the Navy, by Mr. W. F. Shannon, which was issued uniformly with Mr. Jacobs's Sea Urchins and Many Cargoes, has peculiar rights to this kinship. Mr. Shannon and Mr. Jacobs are both clerks in the Savings Bank Department at the General Post Office.

THE Tennyson memorial in Haslemere Church will consist of a stained-glass window, after a design by Burne Jones, representing the vision which Sir Galahad saw in the little chapel.

THE Executive Committee of the Jenner Society have thanked Mr. Rider Haggard for services to the cause rendered by his novel Dr. Thorne.

THE Pastel Society, which has lately been organised, will hold its first exhibition at the beginning of February in the Galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters, Piccadilly. The aim of the Society is to make the art of Pastel and the beautiful results which can be obtained in that medium more widely known in this country. Among members who intend to contribute to the exhibition are Messrs. Swan, Boughton, Watts, Craue, Stott of Oldham, Clausen, Brabazon, Priestman, Muhrman, and Onslow Ford; and among the foreign artists are MM. Carrière, Besnard, Thaulow, Knopff, Gandara, Lenbach, Segantini and Wauters.

Bibliographical.

I AM not so "enthused" as I should like to be by the news that Mr. Byam Shaw has undertaken to illustrate pictorially all the plays of Shakespeare. It is possible to have a very great respect and admiration for Mr. Shaw's capacity, and yet to feel that in attempting to "body forth" all (or most) of the creations of the myriad-minded poet he will tax his powers severely. Can the thing, in truth, be done acceptably by any single artist? It has been essayed before. Look at the drawings which Sir John Gilbert made for an edition of the plays; and look at those which Mr. Gordon Browne made (much more recently) for another. Can one honestly say that adequacy is reached in either case? To illustrate Shakespeare pictorially one wants another Shakespeare of the brush or pencil, and where or when will he be found? Apart from that, the task could be achieved only by a whole company of artists of the highest faculty. I am inclined to think that the most inoffensive of all the single-handed endeavours to illustrate Shakespeare in the bulk was that of Frank Howard, who, by confining himself to figure sketches, and adopting the medium of outline, gave a sort of classical uniformity to his performance.

Prof. Knapp's Life, Writings, and Correspondence of George Borrow is now promised absolutely for March. I do not know what special qualifications the Professor has for performing acceptably his self-chosen task, but one awaits the work with some impatience. Borrow, of course, revealed himself largely in his books. Beyond that, such biographical matter as has been put into type has been fragmentary. With the Memoir by Monsieur H. Duclos, prefixed to the French version of a portion of Lavengro (Bohèmes et Gypsies), I am not acquainted; and, in English, all we have had have been Mr. Watts-Dunton's introduction to Lavengro ("Minerva Library," 1893), Mr. Augustine Birrell's Preface to the same work (1896), and Mr. W. A. Dutt's George Borrow in East Anglia, which belongs to 1896 also. We have plenty of biographies nowadays — indeed, too many — but the writing of them does not often fall to the person or persons most competent for the duty.

Talking of biographies, I am reminded of the Life of Sir Thomas Lawrence which Lord Ronald Gower has been preparing, and which is soon to be issued to the public. This again reminds one of the run there has been of late years on this department of biography; the painters of last century and of this have come unmistakably to the fore. And how numerous, too, have been, in this decade, the autobiographies of the painters! That by Mr. G. A. Storey, which we are to have on the 19th inst., and which has been so happily entitled Sketches from Memory, is the latest of a long line, suggested, I think we may safely say, by the very great success of Mr. Frith's Recollections. "Broome went before, and kindly swept the way." Mr. Frith showed what could be done in this direction, and his example, very naturally, was followed.

Mr. Clement Scott has himself informed the world, through the columns of the Daily Telegraph, that he proposes to occupy his newly-found leisure in the composition of a work on "The Drama of Yesterday and To-day," which he hopes will be ready "before the summer-time of 1899." It is to be "a history of our stage for fifty years, interspersed with anecdotes, reminiscences, and cheerful gossip, and illustrated with pictures of the period, valuable playbills, and such letters of dead and living artists as may be conveniently and discreetly published." It is permissible to regret that Mr. Scott should have elected to compile a book of the sort described, rather than a definite history of the Victorian theatre or an autobiography pure and simple. He could make either of those very attractive; but he seems bent upon trying to combine the two, giving us, it is to be feared, neither an autobiography nor a history which will wholly satisfy.

However, we will hope for the best. Mr. Scott has already published a little brochure called Thirty Years at the Play; and he has been fertile in articles, contributed to annuals, monthlies, and dailies, in which he has recorded his recollections and opinions of playwrights and players of his time. How often have the names of "Fechter," and "Robertson," and "Bancroft," flowed from his ready pen! He has published, under the title of From "The Bells" to "King Arthur", a selection from the notices of the Lyceum Theatre which he has written "day by day" for the Daily Telegraph. His notices in the Telegraph have usually been so lengthy that a complete collection would fill, I should suppose, some dozens of volumes. On the subject of the English stage of the last thirty years he can hardly be uninteresting, whatever he writes; but I wish the forthcoming book were to be either an autobiography or a history — not (as it seems destined to be) a mixture of the two.

Those who are promoting the cause of the proposed Irish Literary Theatre have, I am sure, the good wishes of everybody. By all means let Dublin be the scene of the performances of dramatic works Irish in authorship or in scene and sentiment. That Mr. W. B. Yeats should be prominent in the enterprise is as it should be. Is he not already an acted dramatist? Did not some of us see his "Land of the Heart's Desire" performed at the Avenue Theatre nearly five years ago? (And was not one of the parts, by the way, undertaken by Mr. A. E. W. Mason, now one of the goodly fellowship of romancists?) Perhaps we may now see Mr. Yeats's "Countess Kathleen" put upon our stage. It was published, you may remember, in 1892, "The Land of the Heart's Desire" following it in 1894.

Messrs. Gay & Bird, I think, ought not to advertise the first of their "Bibelot" series as comprising "Coleridge's Table Talk." When one comes to dip into the pretty little volume, one finds that it embodies only a selection from the Table Talk — a fact admitted in the preface. Very often, however, books are bought before the prefaces they contain are read, and those who purchase the first "Bibelot" believing that they are getting the whole of the Table Talk will be, perhaps, proportionately disappointed.

Reviews.

Mr. Hardy as a Poet.

Wessex Poems. By Thomas Hardy. (Harpers. 6s.)

It has become almost the fashion for prose-writers of all kinds to make at least one attempt in verse; and indeed for celebrities generally to essay some art outside that which earned them their fame. A painter or sculptor will make his bow to the public in verse—like Mr. Storey or Mr. Woolner; a distinguished draughtsman, at the close of his career, becomes a popular novelist. A parliamentary leader writes philosophy, a queen turns poetess, a Kaiser becomes everything by turns, and nothing long. Leaders of society take to the stage, leaders of the stage to society. Housemaids turn lady-novelists, lady-journalists turn amateur housemaids. Everybody seems infected with the child's spirit of make-believe: "Let us play we are actors, or novelists, or singers," they say, and they play it. The number of prose-writers who have made their appearance as poets is legion. Mr. George Meredith we do not count, for he has always combined the two characters; but Mr. R. D. Blackmore, Mr. Quiller-Couch, Mr. Conan Doyle, are modern instances one at once remembers, while in the elder generation were Charlotte Brontë and George Eliot. Perhaps the father of novelist-versifiers was Smollett. It is a dubious experiment for a proseman to sit in the Siege Perilous of poetry, as the examples of Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Lecky remind us. To adapt Tacitus, all would have agreed Mr. Ruskin was capable of writing poetry, if he had not written it. With novelists the odds are still greater. As a rule their whole training and nature is not only un-lyrical but anti-lyrical. Their desire is to tell a story or paint a character, and to do so with detailed elaboration, with the aid of constant side-lights, rejecting nothing as common or mean which will serve that central purpose. It is a method anti-poetic even in the case of the ballad. Drama would give them more native scope. But in poetic drama the central figures must be kept on the heroic plane, and accordingly few novelists have essayed poetic drama. When even George Eliot made no unquestioned success as a poet, it needs some courage for a great novelist to come forward in later life with a volume of verse in his hand.

MR. HARDY'S ILLUSTRATION FOR "SHE TO HIM."

This is what Mr. Thomas Hardy has done. Save for what might be styled a "character-song" in one novel, and another slight song in a recent play, he has been sternly faithful to his one remarkable talent. All his life he has been drawing the English peasant, most unpoetical of peasants, with realism faithful to his stolidity, coarseness, and absence of any romance save that of destiny, which is present in all things ruled by Fate. One would expect that Mr. Hardy could scarcely have had time to master the mere technique of verse; that his strong, grim hand would be too heavy for poetry; that with all the forceful picturesqueness of his clean English, it was a tongue "that in chiming numbers would not run," too unalloyedly vernacular and sturdy of limb for the supplejointed Muse. One might also surmise that, like Mr. Conan Doyle, he would rely for most of his success on the ballad. And all these things are so. But what could not have been expected is that, though ballads form the bulk of the book, it is not in these he shows at his best.

No, and the fact is surprising—is contrary to all which could be argued from his vocation as novelist. Here, where he has opportunity for dramatic and characteristic writing, is not his happiest work; but, on the contrary, it must be looked for among the lyrical and personal poems of the opening section. There we find tokens that the stuff of the poet is not lacking in Mr. Hardy, had he chosen to bestow on verse the same concentration which has made him a novelist, had he developed technique by unremitting practice. Dryden achieved his mastery of versification by constant writing, and that Shakespeare did the same there is evidence enough in his plays. Few can write even a fluent song by mere gift of nature, unless they have nothing to say in it—when it seems to come easily enough to over-many versifiers. But Mr. Hardy has something to say. And in some lyrics sheer closeness of thought and feeling seems to make violent seizure of Poetry. Such a compelling hand is laid on her in the following verses:

SHE TO HIM.

I will be faithful to thee; aye, I will
And death shall choose me with a wondering eye
That he did not discern and domicile
One his by right ever since that last good-bye!

I have no care for friends, or kin, or prime
Of manhood who deal gently with me here;
Amid the happy people of my time,
Who work their love's fulfilment, I appear

Numb as a vane that cankers on its point
True to the wind that kissed ere canker came ;
Despised by souls of Now, who would disjoint
The mind from memory, and make Life all aim,
My old dexterities of hue quite gone,
And nothing left for Love to look upon.

The image of the cankered vane is imaginative and subtle. Again, in the poem called "Neutral Tones," the truth of feeling carries the reader over the lack of metrical finish.

We stood by a pond that winter day
And the sun was white, as though chidden of God,
And a few leaves lay on the starving sod,
They had fallen from an ash, and were gray.

Your eyes on me were as eyes that rove
Over tedious riddles solved years ago ;
And some words played between us to and fro—
On which lost the more by our love.

The smile on your mouth was the deadliest thing
Alive enough to have strength to die ;
And a grin of bitterness swept thereby
Like an ominous bird a-wing.

Since then, keen lessons that love deceives,
And wrings with wrong, have shaped to me
Your face, and the God-curst sun, and a tree,
And a pond edged with grayish leaves.

This is concentrated and bitten in with a sparing effectiveness, reminding one of like vignettes in the novels.

But when we come to the ballads, it is different. Based on Wessex stories and memories, we can imagine how effective they would be in Mr. Hardy's prose. The misfortune is that we are reminded of this. We feel the novelist's method, the novelist's hand, and wish the narrative disembarassed of its metre. Here, too, the technical inexpertness which we have already implied is chiefly in evidence ; and the effect is intensified, somehow, by the dialect—which it always needs a crafty hand to make palatable in poetry. The itinerary in "My Cicely" is an extreme example of the novelist's manner misleading the poet :

MR. HARDY'S ILLUSTRATION FOR "THE BURGHEERS."

Passing heaths, and the House of Long Sieging,
I neared the thin steeple
That tops the fair fane of Poore's olden Episcopal see.

And so on. In prose Mr. Hardy could have made it interesting ; in poetry it fatally suggests a versified guide-book. Let us hark back to the lyrics, where a charming poem awaits us for bonne bouche :

Beneath a knap where flown
Nestlings play,
Within walls of weathered stone,
Far away
From the files of formal houses,
By the bough the firstling browses,
Lives a Sweet ; no merchants meet,
No man barter, no man sells,
Where she dwells.

Upon that fabric fair
"Here, is she !"
Seems written everywhere
Unto me.
But to friend and nodding neighbours,
Fellow-wights in lot and labours,
Who descry the times as I,
No such lucid legend tells
Where she dwells.

Should I lapse to what I was In days gone by ;
(Such can not be, but because
Some loves die
Let me feign it)—none would notice
That where she I know by rote is Spread a strange and withering change,
Like a drying of the wells
Where she dwells.

To feel I might have kissed—
Loved as true—
Otherwhere, nor Mine have missed
My life through,
Had I never wandered near her,
Is a thought severe—severer
In the thought that she is nought,
Even as I, beyond the dells
Where she dwells.

And Devotion droops her glance
To recall
What bond-servants of Chance
We are all.
I but found her, in that—going
On my errant path unknowing—
I did not out-skirt the spot
That no spot on earth excels,—
Where she dwells !

That daintily perfect lyric is enough in itself to show the poet in Mr. Hardy, and to justify a book which must, besides, be interesting to all whom his art has captivated—and they are legion. With its sweetness fresh in our mouth, we can close the volume, and thank the writer.

Values.

The Spirit of Place, and Other Essays. By Alice Meynell.
(Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE lover of fine letters, while the rest of the world is about its business or paying its seasonable devotions, will require no greater pleasure than to lose himself in a volume of Mrs. Meynell's essays. They have a thousand qualities of dignity and sincerity, of occasional humour and delicate fantasy. But their central charm is surely less even in the saying than in the thing said: in the freshness, the individuality of the outlook upon life of which they are the expression. Mrs. Meynell's speculation is never alien to the work-a-day world of the plain man. On the contrary, it constantly refers and defers to that. But at the same time you feel that it is in a sense remote, that it moves upon heights from which the perspective alters and inverts the mutual relations of many objects which the work-a-day world presents. Nietzsche—but the gods willed otherwise—proposed to make his masterpiece a "re-valuation of all values"; and, in a less radical degree, the plain man looking into Mrs. Meynell's essays will find that the values of many things there are curiously other than those they have been wont to hold in his daily thought. Aspects of the visible world are suggested as first for his consideration, and he has habitually passed them by; modes of conduct are proposed to him which not merely form no part of his moral ideal, but which hitherto have never been presented for the assessment of his conscience. The plain man carried on a serious controversy with his like in the newspapers the other day as to whether it was consistent with respectability to let your children run about without shoes and stockings. Surely he will think that Mrs. Meynell has neglected the essential factors of the problem when she writes:

Yet the feet should have more of the acquaintance of earth, and know more of flowers, freshness, cool brooks, wild thyme, and salt sand than does anything else about us. It is their calling; and the hands might be glad to be stroked for a day by grass and struck by buttercups, as the feet are of those who go barefoot; and the nostrils might be flattered to be, like them, so long near moss. The face has only now and then, for a resting-while, their privilege.

And again:

You have but to pass a season amongst the barefooted to find that man, who, shod, makes so much ado, is naturally as silent as snow. Woman, who not only makes her armed heel heard, but also goes rustling like a shower, is naturally as silent as snow. The vintager is not heard among the vines, nor the harvester on his threshing-floor of stone. There is a kind of simple stealth in their coming and going, and they show sudden smiles and dark eyes in and out of the rows of harvest when you thought yourself alone. The lack of noise in their movement sets free the sound of their voices, and their laughter floats.

And though he travels, and admires the landscape, it will hardly occur to him, as it does to Mrs. Meynell, to analyse and dissect that landscape, to abstract and define the contribution and individuality of every species of tree, elm and oak and poplar, therein:

But if one could go by all the woods, across all the old forests that are now meadow-lands set with trees, and could walk a country gathering trees of a single kind in the mind, as one walks a garden collecting flowers of a single kind in the hand, would not the harvest be a harvest of poplars? A veritable passion for poplars is a most intelligible passion. The eyes do gather them, far and near, on a whole day's journey. Not one is unperceived, even though great timber should be passed, and hill-sides dense and deep with trees. The fancy makes a poplar day of it. Immediately the country looks alive with signals; for the poplars everywhere reply to the glance. The woods may be all various, but the poplars are separate.

Thus sweetly she teaches him to observe. And we may prophesy that even this lesson will be more readily learnt than those complementary lessons of a more gracious conduct of life which, if so disposed, he might also gather from her. But, doubtless, if he could bring himself to realise that the "slender gray design of shadows upon white walls is better than a tedious, trivial, or anxious device from the shop," and so to leave his walls plain, the vexation of his dwelling would be less. Nor would the personal amenity of him in foreign lands suffer, should he elect to accept Mrs. Meynell's view of the claim of the mendicant, if not for material alms, at least for courtesy in the refusal:

Where the tourist is thoroughly well known, doubtless the company of beggars are used to savage manners in the rich; but about the byways and remoter places there must be still some dismay at the anger, the silence, the indignation, and the inexpensive haughtiness wherewith the opportunity of almsgiving is received by travellers.

The impetuous journalist, from whom in his morning career over yesterday's "output" of literature Mrs. Meynell demands more attention than is in proportion to the bulk and cost of her volume, will complain to you with not unnatural irritation that she is "precious." That is so, in an entirely complimentary sense. She has an unusually strong feeling for the pretium, the value, the significance of words; is careful to fit them finely and subtly to the fineness and subtlety of thought. But the criticism is a superficial one if by it is intended that she lays stress on the trivial and the unessential. All her endeavour is to see things in their true colours and right proportions, to observe only what is worth observing and remember only what is worth remembering. But doubtless the journalist's estimate and standard of worth is not necessarily hers. A fairer criticism would, we think, be that, while she always aims high, she does not always attain her result with the same ease and obliviousness of means. Sometimes she triumphs. Sometimes also the strain, the determination to see or think closely and to write with precise vocabulary, is unduly obvious.

Shootings at Truth.

Joubert: a Selection from his Thoughts. Translated Katharine Lyttelton. With a Preface by Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Duckworth. 8s.)

To English readers Joubert is best known by the critical and interpretative study which finds a place among Matthew Arnold's Essays. This, however, may well be supplemented by Mrs. Lyttelton's careful and scholarly translation of a liberal number of the Pensées, and by the sympathetic biographical sketch which has been contributed to the volume by Mrs. Humphry Ward. Joubert, like his intimate friend and fellow-worker Chateaubriand, belongs to the reaction in France from the beliefs and principles of the Revolution. As a young man he came under the influence of Diderot, most fertile and ingenious of the philosophes; but for himself he never construed philosophy except by help of the comment of faith, and he lived to welcome Napoleon, and to form an intolerant and ultramontane écnaele under the restored Bourbons. Nevertheless, he was by temper a critic and a philosophic dreamer, not a politician; and the results of his lifelong meditations over men and books find expression in some intimate letters, and in that volume of Pensées which has so singular a charm for those who do not feel, or who feel sufficiently to understand and make allowance for, its limitations. The Pensées belong to a genre of literature which has hardly existed out of France; wise, sentimental, or witty, they are reflets of truth, caught as it passes on swallow wings, rather than truth itself in its lucid and ordered presentment. "I can sow," said Joubert of himself, "but I cannot build or found"; and, again, "I am like an Æolian harp, that can sound a few beautiful notes, but cannot play an air. No constant wind has ever breathed upon me." You will not find in him formal instruction, or any unity beyond that of personality, but you will find sidelights of observation and reflection upon the art of making books, and the conduct of those delicate relations of friendship and human intercourse which he understood so well. The dynamic ideas which stir the world are not his, but he stimulates and, even more, he clarifies the soul. Above all, he has the French gift of faultless expression in prose. He wrote with difficulty: "My thoughts! it is the building a house for them that troubles me"; but he wrote to purpose, having of his race the gift of happy metaphor and limpid statement that makes even commonplaces imperishable.

In translating Joubert, Mrs. Lyttelton has throughout taken Matthew Arnold as a model; and, indeed, where Matthew Arnold chanced to translate a pensée in the course of his essay, she has invariably, and wisely, adopted the rendering. The collection is grouped under some score of headings; but, roughly speaking, the first half of it is concerned rather with life, religion, conduct, and philosophy, the latter half with art and literature, the making and makers of books. Here, then, are some fragments from Joubert's wisdom of life:

Thought is one of the tasks of life, a method of attainment, a road, a passage, but not an end in itself. To know, and to be known, are the two points of rest; here will be the happiness of souls.

Go, and inquire of the young; they know everything!

The evening of life comes bearing its own lamp.

Politeness is the blossom of our humanity. Whoever is not sufficiently polite is not sufficiently humane.

Dare I say it? God may be easily known if only we do not force ourselves to define Him.

Whither go our ideas? Into the memory of God.

One should be fearful of being wrong in poetry when one thinks differently from the poets, and in religion when one thinks differently from the saints.

The hatred between the two sexes is almost unquenchable.

The punishment of those who have loved women too much is to love them always.

Hidden perfumes and secret loves betray themselves.

As a critic of literature, Joubert lays his stress rather on matter than on form. To him, as to Arnold himself, poetry is "a criticism of life." Thought is the first thing; style is to wing and sharpen the thought. The central quality in a book is, therefore, soul; the soul, the personality of the writer, shining through and informing the written page.

Nothing that does not carry us away is poetry. The lyre is in some sort a winged instrument.

There must be in a poem not only the poetry of images, but also the poetry of ideas.

Brilliant phrases are the natural expression of an adorned memory, a stirred heart, an enlightened mind, and a keen eye.

It is great art to know how to make one's thought fly like an arrow, and bury itself in the attention.

The most humble style has the savour of beauty if it expresses a great and beautiful soul.

Joubert's bête noire in literature is certainly Voltaire. He had come too near to him for a detached judgment. His mocking sentences gather irony from their admission of qualities.

Voltaire had correctness of judgment, liveliness of imagination, nimble wits, quick taste, and a moral sense in ruins.

Voltaire would have patiently read through thirty or forty folio volumes to find one small irreligious joke.

Voltaire knew the light and disported himself in it, but in order that he might scatter and deflect all its rays like a mischievous child. He is a goblin, who in the course of his evolutions sometimes takes on the shape and air of high genius.

One is, of course, provoked by these criticisms to realise that Joubert's own contribution to the world's advancement is but as one to a thousand when compared with Voltaire's. But it is a point of view after all, though a small one.

Poeticules, Mostly.

The Garland of New Poetry by Various Writers.
(Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

THERE are eight who contribute to this slim little volume: the Muses themselves numbered but one more. Their names are Victor Plarr, Selwyn Image, Laurence Binyon, A. Romney Green, Manmohan Ghose, and Reginald Balfour, with whom are two that know no names, the phantoms "Anodos" and "E. L." Co-operative publication of poetry has hardly had a fair chance. There have been two or three volumes of a Parisian annual of this kind, and the Rhymers' Club, a lustre ago, issued two little collections not without merit. One would fancy that, in these days of metrical accomplishment, there must be many writers who turn out three or four good copies of verses in a year, and who would prefer such a mode of publication to either the ephemeral glories of a magazine, or the tremendous venture of a personal book. However, if anybody means to make a success of the thing, he must go further afield than Mr. Elkin Mathews has done, and seek at once greater variety of inspiration and a robuster note. For, with the best will in the world, we cannot persuade ourselves that the present garland contains many flowers that are not doomed to fade. The eight sing prettily, but oh! how thinly, and with what lack of strenuous or individual accent. Mr. Binyon, of course, is a poet, but then he is responsible for two volumes of his own this year, and his contributions here must be held to be of grace. Mr. Victor Plarr, if we are not mistaken, is the sole link between the Rhymers' Club and the younger venture. He is wisely put in the forefront of the book. He has more to say, and says it with more vigour and directness, than his fellows. We like best the sentiment and the dignity of expression in "The Firstborn," which is too long to quote. But here are two good stanzas upon a demolished London grove:

How beautiful you were, forgotten grove,
How classic and how tall, O little wood!
'Gainst the red winter sunsets, O my love,
How shapely forth you stood!

The birds of spring mid your green spaces whirled:
They could not leave the pleasant grove they knew;
And once, at dawn, a single time, I heard
The cuckoo's voice in you!

And here is a gracious little fancy, "On Change of Opinions":

As you advance in years you long
For what you scorned when but a boy:
Then 'twas the town, now the birds' song
Is your obsession and your joy.

And as you lie and die, maybe
You will look back, unreconciled
To that dark hour, and clearly see Yourself a little wistful child.

Into the jaws of death you'll bring
No virile triumph, wrought with pain;
But only to the monster fling
The daydream and the daisy-chain,

The lispéd word, the gentle touch,
The wonder, and the mystic thought,
For old gray Death upon his crutch
To rake into his Bag of Nought.

Next to Mr. Plarr we should put "Anodos," whose verse, though its frailty does not bear analysis, has a certain delicate quality of mystery and glamour. We have not a notion, for instance, what "Wilderspin" means, but there is a fascination about the way it is done, nevertheless:

In the little red house by the river,
When the short night fell,
Beside his web sat the weaver,
Weaving a twisted spell.
Mary and the Saints deliver
My soul from the nethermost hell!

In the little red house by the rushes
It grew not dark at all,
For day dawned over the bushes
Before the night could fall.
Where now a torrent rushes
The brook ran thin and small.

In the little red house a chamber
Was set with jewels fair;
There did a vine clamber
Along the clambering stair,
And grapes that shone like amber
Hung at the window there.

Will the loom not cease whirring?
Will the house never be still?
Is never a horseman stirring
Out and about on the hill?
Was it the cat purring?
Did someone knock at the sill?

To the little red house a rider
Was bound to come that night,
A cup of sheeny cider
Stood ready for his delight.
And, like a great black spider,
The weaver watched on the right.

To the little red house by the river
I came when the short night fell.
I broke the web for ever,
I broke my heart as well.
Michael and the Saints deliver
My soul from the nethermost hell!

Mr. Selwyn Image begins with two charming lines, and tails off at once; Mr. Manmohan Ghose has one fairly good sonnet; and the rest is silence.

The Badminton "Athletics."

Athletics. By Montague Shearman. (Longmans, Green & Co. 10s. 6d.)

IN only one other country besides England could the Badminton volume on athletics have been produced. That country, of course, is America, where they carry the craze for everything in the form of exercise to far greater extremes than even in the old country. It may be doubted, however, whether the Americans have ever produced a better book on the subject than that which Mr. Montague Shearman has edited. Himself a famous runner—he was 100 yards champion in 1876, and quarter-mile champion four years later—he proves in his own person that he who runs may read, for he contributes a capital sketch of the progress of athletics from ancient times, which must mean a wide and discriminative acquaintance with much scattered literature. The editors of the "Badminton" series have been singularly fortunate in finding good writers among celebrated athletes. Who that has read it can forget the delightful chapter on "Bowling" which Mr. A. G. Steel contributed to the "Cricket" volume? It has all the sparkle and ingenuity of his own incomparable style.

The progress of athletics is well illustrated by the history of the present volume. At first, in 1887, the subject was lumped together with football (in both kinds):

but it has long been evident that it required a special treatise to itself, and we have no doubt that Mr. Shearman has had the utmost difficulty in compressing his wealth of material into the present 356 pages. The only lengthened description he permits himself is an account of the Amateur Championship meeting of 1886, when on a single afternoon the 100 yards was done by Wharton, the coloured gentleman, in 10 secs., the quarter in $49\frac{1}{2}$ secs., the half in 1 min. 59 secs., and the mile in 4 min. $25\frac{1}{2}$ secs. These times have all been beaten since, but never before had such performances been achieved in one day by bona fide amateurs. We should have liked a more detailed account of the celebrated mile race at Lillie Bridge when W. G. George with his long stride kept close to that "corky" little runner, W. Cummings, for five-sixths of the distance, and then raced past him as if he were standing still, and won in the never equalled time of 4 min. $12\frac{3}{4}$ secs. Another epic performance was the long jump of C. B. Fry in the University Sports of 1892. The present writer was close to the take-off, and saw the jumper come down the path like a racehorse, and take the jump like a bullet out of a gun. Everybody knew that something great had been achieved, and one was hardly surprised when "23 feet 5 inches" went up on the marking board. Moments like those live long in the memory, even of the spectators. What must the performers feel? We do not doubt that if Sir R. E. Webster, who contributes an interesting introduction to this volume, had to part with his G.C.M.G. or the "blue" that he won when he beat the Oxford representative in the mile race of 1864 it is not the light blue ribbon that he would sacrifice.

Mr. Shearman gives the winners of the Amateur Championships and of the Oxford and Cambridge Sports, but he does not bore us with too many "records." These often represent, not so much exceptional excellence in the performers, as exceptional conditions of weather and the like. In fact, we are quite as much interested in some historical performances which would not satisfy the A.A.A., as in the better-verified feats of the present day. We like the butcher of Croydon who ran (in 1653) from St. Albans to London, a distance of twenty miles, in less than an hour and a half, "and the last four miles so gently that he seemed to meditate": also the running-footman who in 1720 ran four miles round a racecourse in 18 minutes—a feat barely equalled by Henry Kingsley's "muscular Christian" curate (in Geoffrey Hamlyn) who did the same distance in twenty minutes, then vaulted over a gate, took off his hat to a lady, and drew his watch out of his pocket to time himself.

The performances duly attested by stop-watch are, however, remarkable enough. Think of Harry Hutchens (of whom, curiously enough, there is no mention in the book), whose powers were first revealed by the speed with which, as a newspaper boy, he sped from carriage to carriage on Putney Station platform. Hutchens once ran 300 yards in 30 seconds. It is odd that to cover another 140 yards takes even a Myers or a Tindall 18 seconds more; but this may be partially due to the fact that all quarter-mile courses have a curve in them. Colbeck was the first quarter-miler to do the entire distance at top speed. On one occasion he cannoned against a sheep and broke its leg, but still completed the distance in $50\frac{3}{4}$ secs. As for jumping, six feet has several times been surmounted since M. J. Brooks electrified Lillie Bridge by jumping 6 ft. $2\frac{1}{2}$ in.; and the record now rests with M. F. Sweeney, an Irish-American, whose curious style is well illustrated in the picture reproduced above. Irishmen, like Irish horses, are great "leppers." Another Emerald Islander, W. J. M. Newburn, has long-jumped a foot further than C. B. Fry. This sort of thing, of course, requires the most intelligent training, a subject in regard to which Mr. Shearman's advice is excellent. The modern trainer suits the conditions to the man, and does not insist too much on hard-and-fast rules. "No smoking" is, of course, one of them, but it was hardly necessary to emphasise this by the silly picture on p. 193. Take it altogether, however, and we can imagine no better hand-book for an athlete or an ex-athlete (and most Englishmen come into one or other class) than this latest volume of the "Badminton" series.

M. F. SWEENEY JUMPING.

Cannibals and Pigmies.

The Land of the Pigmies. By Captain Guy Burrows. (Pearson. 21s.)

LAST week we drew attention to Captain Cayley Webster's pictures of cannibal life in the South Sea Islands. In Captain Burrows' book we have even more striking pictures of cannibalism and its juxtaposition to the civilised life of Europeans. Indeed, in these pages we find more good sense on this painful subject than we have often read before. The notion that cannibals are the lowest type of man is very prevalent, but it is erroneous. Captain Burrows has no hesitation in asserting that this unnatural practice stands by itself, seeming not in any way to affect or retard the development of the better emotions. Thus, tribes to whom cannibalism is quite foreign are in many cases more bloodthirsty and far less advanced, both morally and socially, than others openly addicted to it. It does not follow at all that because the natives of the interior evince a liking for human flesh they are, on the whole, inferior to those who treat the practice with contempt and abhorrence.

This is in entire agreement with the opinions expressed by Mr. Herbert Ward in his book, Five Years Among the Congo Cannibals. The pigmies, who are of a very low type, are not cannibals. They are wretched little nomads, without arts, without the sense of time, without religion, without divinations; they are, in our author's opinion, "the closest link with the original Darwinian anthropoid ape extant," but—they do not eat human flesh. They will sooner starve. Strange as it may seem, cannibalism argues a certain social advance. Its origin was probably hunger; its continuance has rested on warlike ideas such as the one—so common in Central Africa and elsewhere—that to eat the heart of a foe is to absorb his valour. Any attempt to eradicate cannibalism must take account of these facts if it is to be successful.

Captain Burrows quotes Shakespeare's phrase, "Anthropophagi, and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders"; and asks: "Did he mean cannibals and stunted dwarfs? We shall never get to the root of his shrewd omniscience." By anthropophagi we should say he undoubtedly meant cannibals—what else? The word was used in that sense in 1552 in a sermon preached before Edward VI.; and it is certain that Shakespeare had read Montaigne's essay on cannibals. Has Captain Burrows? It would interest him. We commend this book to all who follow events and discoveries in Central Africa. It is an entertaining record of valuable facts.

Seventeenth Century Domesticities.

Memoirs of Lady Russell and Lady Herbert, 1622-1723.
Compiled from Original Family Documents by Lady Stepney. (A. & C. Black. 5s.)

"ONE of the most charming sights in the world is a married pair united by a true affection, based on congeniality of sentiment and principle." So, four generations ago, when these memoirs were preparing, prettily wrote Lady Stepney's mitted hand. The brief fragments that follow—letters from Lady Russell to her husband, written during the rare seasons of separation that occurred in the fourteen years of their united life—present with their demure fervour a fitting text for this sedate comment. On both sides theirs was a love match, and to the day of his execution in the troublous times of the third Stuart, their passion, or at least hers, still burned: her letters are the sign. Three years after her marriage she wrote: "My best life, you that know so well how to love and to oblige, make my felicity entire by believing my heart possessed with all the gratitude, honour, and passionate affection to your person any creature is capable of or can be obliged to." Upon the prospect of his return home she wrote some years later: "I should condemn my sense of this expected happiness as weak and pitiful if I could tell it you. No, my best life, I can say little; but think all you can, and you cannot think too much; my heart makes it all good."

Lady Russell had been married some ten years, and was forty-three, when she wrote: "I am touched with a sensible regret that I cannot pour out in words what my heart is so big with, which is more just to your dear self (in a passionate return of love and gratitude) than I can tell you." She was not only a woman of passion, but a woman of wits; and if Russell came to grief amid the treacherous shoals of Court intrigue, it was not through a too submissive following of her counsels. After his death she took refuge (as such a woman must) in devotion; and for the rest of her days maintained a highly edifying correspondence with Burnet, Tillotson, and other clergymen of renown. To one of them (it is not easy from the arrangement of the text to determine which, but it does not matter) she writes this curious passage: "We shall, as your phrase is, be renewed like eagles; and we like eagles mount up to meet the Lord coming in the clouds, and now tarry with Him, and be no more faint or weary in God's service. These are ravishing contemplations, Doctor!"

As patroness of certain benefices she was scrupulous in the discharge of her trust. "I can," she writes, "with all my scruples, make no exception to Mr. Swayne, if his vapours are not too prevalent to permit his being free and active in such a charge." Was that written gravely? If so, she may have lacked one last perfection; and, indeed, there is no evidence here that she possessed the grace of humour. But her unconscious humour makes amends. Love, politics, religion—she is equally serious about them all.

Information Made Playful.

The Amateur Antiquary. By R. H. Forster. (Mawson, Swan & Morgan, Newcastle-on-Tyne. 6s.)

THE title of this book does not convey a very precise indication of its contents, which relate to the Piets' Wall. It is in no sense a contribution to the sum of our knowledge concerning the great Roman fortification; nor is it so much as a popular introduction to the study of the remains. "Information made playful" is perhaps as close a description of its character as it is possible to give; and it may conceivably justify its existence by rousing here and there among the unlearned or the indifferent sufficient interest in the subject to tempt a stray rambler to buy Bruce's Wallet-Book and pay a visit to Hadrian's great work. Within these limits, it is a creditable performance: careful and accurate in respect of historical scholarship, and, except for the garnish of jokes and hyphens, quite readable. For the latter noxious weed, the printer may be partly responsible; in that case, however, they should have been rooted out in proof. But the waggery, we fear, can be laid only to the author. And his jests are of the sorriest. Some of them are Cockney, and provoke irritation; some are "deofeeecult," and induce melancholy. The legionary soldier figures as "T. Atkinsius." When, at the first glimpse of the Wall, the second century tourists race each other for it, the outraged sentry angrily asks them "whether they think they are in a maledicted circus." Ælia Commindus was "a wife whose very name 'wore the breeks.'" The get-up of the book would be faultless were it not for the size: unless necessitated by the exigencies of illustration, there is no excuse for cumbering the reader with a quarto volume.

Postscript.

ILLUSTRATED editions of The Pilgrim's Progress multiply. Quite recently came one by Mr. Anning Bell, and last year the best of them all—the late C. H. Bennett's—was reprinted. Now, more in the Bennett manner, comes a large edition from Messrs. Pearson, with many drawings by the brothers Rhead, three American draughtsmen. Their work is often forcible and adequate, as in the cut we reproduce. That, we think, is excellent. The level is not, however, always maintained, and in some of their attempts to render expression that shall answer to Bunyan's merciless nomenclature the artists remind us of illustrations to Lavater. But just as Bunyan wrote for simple folk, so it may be considered that his latest illustrators do not draw for art critics. We are certain that by these drawings the value of the allegory will be heightened in many homes. The preface to this edition is by the Rev. H. R. Haweis.

The portrait facing the title-page of a volume called Henry Robert Reynolds, D.D.: his Life and Letters (Hodder & Stoughton), shows a face of singular purity, of aquiline outline, marred by a ragged fringe of whisker apparently tied in a bow under the chin. It was the fashion in the days when Dr. Reynolds was "pastor" at the little town of Halstead, in Essex, and during the years (1849—1853) when he was at Leeds. The letters collected by Dr. Reynolds's sisters into this volume of nearly six hundred pages breathe a uniform spirit of piety and simplicity, of human tenderness and habitual recollection. For those who have been brought at any time into communion with the amiable subject of the memoir this rich collection of his incidental correspondence will be a welcome memorial of him. But he really did take things seriously. How surprised William Makepeace Thackeray would be to learn that in the sixties his elaborate moralities were likened to "a comment on the Book of Ecclesiastes, full of awful warnings and terrible strokes." Fancy Vanity Fair "reading in part like some old prophet's sarcasm." Well, perhaps they thought so in the sixties.

Any island that saw the birth of the great Dumas deserves public attention, hence we recommend Mr. Robert T. Hill's account of the West Indies, under the title of Cuba and Porto Rico (Unwin), particularly for its account of Haiti. The Black Republic has always had an interest above any of its companion Indies, and we regret that Mr. Hill's description is not longer than it is. Sir Spencer St. John's standard work is, indeed, not improved upon, except in minor matters. The population, says Mr. Hill, is now nine-tenths black and one-tenth coloured, and the one-tenth is gradually getting black; but the nation generally is—except the Cubans, the Porto Ricans, and Barbardians—the only virile and advancing one in the West Indies. Although the proportion of females to males is three to one, a pretty girl is the exception. Honesty is so prevalent that one may travel throughout the island with gold coin clinking in one's pockets and never meet a thief or want a free lodging. Mr. Hill offers in this bulky volume a tremendous store of facts and scores of good photographs. His work is not literature, but it is interesting.

"We have all of us many and grievous faults. It is good to think of them sometimes, that we may know ourselves, and that we may know how to deal with them." This is an extract from Helps to Godly Living (Stock), a little book of selections from the sermons and addresses of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, collected by J. H. Burn, B.D. The aids are, in the main, counsels of perfection, and sometimes they are over wordy; but a passage every morning may solace some.

To Mr. Dent's "Temple Classics" have recently been added the Mahabharata, India's great epic, in Mr. Romesh Chandra Dutt's condensed translation; Browning's Paracelsus; and Endymion, and the Longer Poems of John Keats. The term "Temple Classic" is elastic. Mr. Dent's "Temple" edition of Scott has reached Quentin Durward. Mr. Shorter, in his bibliographical note, calls this story "one of the best of the Waverley novels," italicising the words as we have done. We do not demur, but there are reasons for expressing the opinion in slightly different form. Slang and criticism may be well kept apart.

A little outburst of Kailyardism—familiar and honoured—has just occurred at Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's. The result is that four new editions lie before us: Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush, The Days of Auld Lang Syne, A Window in Thrums, and Auld Licht Idylls, all illustrated. The artists who share the work are Mr. William Hole and Mr. A. S. Boyd, and their pictures are in keeping with the homely text.

Lay and Clerical Head Masters.

By a Master.

THE question whether taking Holy Orders ought, or ought not, to be the chief road to promotion in the teaching-profession is one which imperatively needs full and open discussion. By the constitution of most important schools an authority so absolute that it has no parallel in any other calling is placed in the hands of head masters, and it is therefore obvious that on their character and capacity all progress in secondary education essentially depends. If the quality of head masters deteriorates, the quality of education must deteriorate too, and no minor improvements can effect any real good unless those who possess complete control are also the men most fitted to do so.

The simple proposition thus stated cannot be denied by any sane man, yet in the regulation of scholastic preferment exactly the opposite principle prevails. The vast majority of the masters in our great schools are laymen, but every chief place of power and profit is held by a clergyman. Professional merit and proved ability do not weigh as the dust in the balance with governing bodies in the election of a head master, unless a candidate is in Orders or willing to take them. In fact, while three-quarters of the teaching profession are condemned to perpetual subordination, the whole government of secondary education is entrusted to men selected from a small and dwindling minority.

From this condition of things—and the facts, though startling, are indisputable—two consequences seem necessarily to flow. The first is, that no profession can prosper in which all hope of success is denied to most of its members; the second is, that head masters of distinguished ability are becoming daily rarer. Both consequences are of extreme gravity, and to the second there attaches an equally grave corollary: when the temptation to take Orders is made so overwhelming, it is impossible that the motives of some of those who take them should not be questioned.

Of the first of these consequences it is not the special object of this article to speak, although its dull and numbing influence is visible everywhere, checking zeal and crushing energy, until the ablest and most ambitious men sink into mere creatures of routine whose chief object is to keep their houses full of boys and the balance at their bankers' big. Of the truth of the second no one connected with school affairs can entertain any doubt. It is invidious to mention names, but even a cursory examination will disclose to any inquirer the fact that not a few positions of high eminence and rich remuneration in the scholastic world are occupied by men who, had they remained at the Universities, would never have aspired even to a college lectureship. In the field of scholarship and theology the headmasters of the present day are, with one or two exceptions, wholly unknown; while, if the secret deliberations of governing bodies could be revealed, the history of election after election during the last twenty years would demonstrate that the electors, instead of having a large choice among first-rate candidates, have either to content themselves with decent mediocrity or to extend their search entirely outside the scholastic profession. Sometimes they are driven to select a candidate who, either immediately before or after his appointment, stoops to offer the solemn vows of ordination on the altar of advancement.

It is not easy to discuss in a temperate spirit a state of affairs so clearly injurious to education, nor is it easy to deal with the arguments of its supporters, because no one has ever ventured either to state them or to defend them publicly. They are kept hidden in a convenient obscurity; but, as far as can be surmised, they are founded partly on ancient prejudice surviving from the time when Fellows of colleges took Orders as a matter of routine, partly on a curious but potent combination of religious zealotry and worldly prudence. "The interests of religion require a clergyman," hints one; "a layman would frighten parents and diminish your numbers," suggests another. Both these specious arguments need examination.

As to the first, it seems almost a contradiction in terms to urge that the interests of religion can only be supported by injustice and by fraud. Yet it is by injustice that the unbroken succession of clerical head masters is perpetuated in our great schools. Almost everywhere clerical restrictions have been removed by Parliament; lay candidates cannot openly be rejected, and are often definitely invited to submit their testimonials as though for an impartial consideration of their claims. But they never receive it. Though always eligible, they are never elected. No matter who are the candidates, in the case of the great boarding-schools the appointment always falls to someone who is either in Orders or who is willing to accept them. If justice or an honest obedience to their statutes guided governing bodies, a simple consideration of mathematical chances will show that this result is absolutely impossible.

But what is the effect of this system on religious feeling in our schools? The answer is plain. Evil can by its nature only produce evil, and the effect is, and must be, bad. Religious teaching has, it is true, within the last fifty years made rapid progress, and that progress has, in a manner which suggests reflection, been coincident with the increase of the number of laymen among assistant masters. But there is a limit to everything, and the religious earnestness which has characterised many of these men in the past is gradually showing signs of disappearing. Silently, but surely, there is spreading among them a feeling which, if not already anti-clerical, is yet dangerously akin. Year by year they see men, often distinctly their inferiors, promoted to high place solely by reason of their having taken Orders, and that, too, frequently under circumstances which preclude the supposition of a purely spiritual call. They cannot, and they do not, respect such leaders. Some of them, they know, are good men; others of them, they are convinced, have for the sake of preferment yielded to a temptation which they themselves have felt and conquered. They recognise sincerely the sacredness of the clerical calling; they acknowledge that a clergyman may have some advantages as a teacher; they desire earnestly that clergymen and laymen should stand side by side in a common warfare against ignorance and unbelief; but they feel acutely their present degradation. They are also beginning to resent it. Instead of warm co-operation their attitude towards religious teaching is becoming that of cold isolation. "We are publicly branded as unfit for this high work," is their scarcely conscious thought; "let those who reap the reward also bear the burden." The sentiment is not noble, but injustice does not breed noble sentiments. Crush men persistently, and the ultimate result will be to crush the life out of them; not only in things intellectual but also in things spiritual the animating impulse will disappear. It may be in the interests of religion nowadays that lay teachers should be so treated, but St. Paul, when he sets "prophets" and "teachers" side by side, or enumerates the equal though diverse "gifts" of the Divine Spirit, seems hardly to encourage such a view.

Space demands that the second argument against laymen—which is deduced from worldly prudence—should be dismissed briefly; nor is it, in fact, worthy of any but the curtest treatment, for it is a mean and ignoble argument. There are, after all, such things as right and wrong, and some regard should be paid to them, even at a slight risk. Yet the risk, even when weighed in the most strictly commercial scales, is almost inappreciable. In the case of day-schools, it has been proved by experiment to be wholly non-existent, and some of these laborious and poorly-paid positions have actually been conceded to laymen, while no one—not even a member of the bench of bishops—can assert that men like the headmasters of Dulwich and of St. Paul's have brought discredit on the scholastic calling, or lowered its dignity.

But, it is said, the case of boarding-schools is widely different. The plain answer is, that in every such school throughout the kingdom, the housemasters—who are chiefly laymen, and whose relationship to the boys under their charge is far more intimate than that of a headmaster can be—receive everywhere the fullest and most complete confidence of parents. This clear fact demolishes the argument that laymen would not be trusted, but even it does not destroy the resources of objection. It is still urged that the appointment of a lay headmaster would frighten some timid parents, and that this argument cannot be proved to be invalid. This purely hypothetical plea had, it must be allowed, at one time weight, and was incapable of actual experimental disproof, because those who put it forward have taken care that no layman should ever be in a position to demonstrate its falsity. Happily, during the last year, the headship of one great public school has been held by a layman, and, although his intention to take Orders was not generally known, the school has not suffered in any respect from the circumstance of his being without them. This plain and positive fact makes it henceforth impossible for any honest man to urge against the appointment of laymen the poor policy of worldly prudence. The timid advocates of truth and justice may at last look up without any fear of that ragged and beggarly plea being again flaunted in their faces.

I have written strongly because I feel strongly, and no one conversant with the facts can assert that the language used exceeds in any way the just measure of a righteous indignation. Moreover, strong and definite language is indispensable, because on the opposite side there exists what is almost a conspiracy of silence. Governing bodies, by replacing in their statutes a clerical test which Parliament had deliberately removed, injure education and violate their trust; but they act in secret and cannot be questioned. The clerical schoolmasters, too, who profit by their illegal conduct are equally determined to speak no word. Again and again the great headmasters have been publicly challenged to defend their case, but it is in vain. They know that their own honour is closely touched and that the welfare of education is vitally concerned; but, like politicians in place, they are discreetly dumb. They know that, in the judgment of nearly all members of their calling, a great wrong is, like a disregarded disease, eating into the very heart of educational life; but all they wish is to hide the painful truth and to shirk the necessary remedy. The public interest, on the other hand, demands that there should be searching examination and prompt treatment. Parliament, it is believed, will shortly deal with the whole question of secondary education. Doubtless, however, strong efforts will be made to keep this root evil concealed from its cognisance, and it is to prevent such concealment that this article has been written. I do not desire to prejudge the case; I only state it as it presents itself to many thoughtful minds, and ask Parliament to investigate it fully, to decide it definitely, and finally to see that its own enactments are not habitually set aside by the very men whom it appoints to carry them into effect.

Public School Libraries.

What Boys Read.

WE have applied to the librarians of a large number of our Public Schools for particulars of the collections of books under their charge. The replies have been numerous and lengthy—too numerous and too lengthy for quotation. The particulars given below will, however, interest some of our readers. From Bradfield College we have received a copy of the Bradfield College Chronicle for last December, from which we quote the following remarks, founded on an inspection of the college library entry book:

We have just been looking through the Library Book, and on glancing down its columns were amazed to find how often entries of the same book recur. Three hundred of all the works in the library would seem to suffice to supply the hundred-and-twenty or so volumes that go forth week by week to be read; and all of those are of recent production. . . . Who now reads Helen's Babies? Who can be induced to look at Tales from Blackwood? Harry Lorrequer and Charles O'Malley seldom see the inside of a class-room; Peter Simple is a hero of the past. Even the fame of Jorrocks seems to be dead.

This is a modern and romantic age; and sentimental, too, for if it has forgotten Edna Lyall, it loves its Marie Corelli! Romances—good, bad, and indifferent—are always in request. Dumas and Weyman, Doyle and Haggard, Hope and Merriman change hands weekly, and only come back at the end of the term to be rebound. Tales of imaginary wars, ghosts, cannibals, detectives, and Thugs share a like distinction. And then the humorists! What a pleasure it must be to make for the first time the acquaintance of Huck Finn and "Them Two Old Frauds"; but poor Pickwick must turn green with envy —if such a genial soul could—to find himself neglected for the Three Men in a Boat and the Diary of a Pilgrimage. Poetry there is in plenty waiting for a public; sad or silly, grave or gay, no one seems to want it, unless in a volume delicately bound, that looks well lying on a table.

Some read Scott—Kenilworth and Ivanhoe; some read Thackeray—Vanity Fair or The Newcomes; others favour Marion Crawford, but the taste of these is eclectic and runs in families; they read where their elder brothers have read before them, and their younger brothers will as certainly do the same in the future.

Darwin is not wholly overlooked, but the later pages in his works are abnormally clean, and occasionally a would-be essayist seeks a model for his style. But after all most lists begin in the same way: Lust of Hate, Rupert of Hentzau, The Beautiful White Devil; and so many perforce go disappointed. And what problems those same lists afford!

Vague descriptions such as “Rupert of Henshort,” or the “Sowars,” or “Frozeoh”; portmanteaus like the “Dropped Island,” or even the simple spoonerism such as “Heir of Wermistoun.” Most are short; some are long. One there is who weekly writes out a complete list of Kipling’s works, always in the same order, and always gets the first; and another who does the like for Rider Haggard.

Some few rely on the librarian to make a choice for them; but they surely must be perplexed when what one authority describes as awfully good is labelled by the next awful rot. And this invariably is the case.

We give brief particulars of the libraries in selected Public Schools:

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.

There are two libraries: (1) The Old Library, properly called The Busby Library; (2) The Library, properly called The Scott Library.

The contents of the first library, which are very valuable, are not accessible to the boys except by special permission.

The Library (as the boys call it) was founded to commemorate the services of Dr. Scott (head master 1855-83).

At the present time The Library occupies the whole of the first floor of Ashburnham House, a magnificent suite of five rooms, lighted by electric light, and contains about 6,000 volumes. It is essentially a modern library for the use of boys and masters, and is arranged according to subjects.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE.

The library is called the Adderley Library, and was founded in the year 1848 by the late F. Alleyne McFeachy, Esq. It now consists of over 8,000 volumes, and includes standard works in divinity, classics, biography, history, poetry, science, mathematics, and general literature. Works of fiction are generally excluded, though we have a few—viz., Thackeray, George Eliot, C. Kingsley, Scott, Mrs. Gaskell, Miss Austen, and the Brontës.

The library is housed in a large room in C. House (the scene of Mr. Stanley Weyman’s new book, The Castle Inn) which will hold about sixty boys. It is open every day for three or four hours at stated times, mostly in preparation hours.

SHREWSBURY SCHOOL.

This school possesses a large and valuable library of old books, some of them, no doubt, from monastic libraries which existed in Shrewsbury before the Reformation. Here, for instance (according to Prof. Skeat), is preserved the oldest MS. of a miracle play in existence in this country. Within the last three or four years a hitherto unknown broadside of the time of Henry VIII. (two copies of it) was discovered in the binding of one of our old books. We have also a small and carefully selected library of modern standard books and books of reference for the use of the older boys. In each of the boarding-houses is a library of a lighter character—poetry, travels, good works of fiction—and these books are given out weekly for perusal.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

The library of this school contains more than 3,000 volumes. In the last five years Ballantyne and Kingston have given way to Mr. Henty, who, in his turn, is yielding to such novelists as Guy Boothby and Edna Lyall. There are, however, not many novels as distinct from boys’ tales. There is a very fair proportion of solid books, but these are not much drawn upon. The boys number 160, and they take out about 120 books per week.

SHERBORNE SCHOOL.

This school is fortunate in the possession of a fine old library of more than four thousand volumes. The library is said to be the finest room in the West of England. It is a genuine fifteenth century hall, with a stained glass window commemorating the Jubilee of Queen Victoria. One MS. catalogue of the library exists, the date of which cannot be later than 1695, and it is evidently a copy of an older catalogue. The school tradition is that the library of the post-Reformation school was founded by Bishop Jewell. The Sixth Form use the library as a reading-room, and may take out three volumes at a time. The rest of the school use the library as a reading-room at stated times and may take out one volume at a time.

We regret to be compelled to compress into very small limits the interesting information supplied to us by the following schools and colleges:

LANCING SCHOOL.—There are two libraries—the Fellows’ and the Boys’. The first is a fine collection of books in theology, classics, history, and general literature. The boys’ library is more popular, and is accessible at stated hours.

ST. PETER’S COLLEGE, RADLEY.—Here, also, there are two libraries. The boys’ library was originated by the founder, Dr. Sewell, and began its career well. It then went through a period of neglect, but is now being revived. In the library the cases are locked, and there are fixed hours for borrowing the books, which consist chiefly of poetry, travel, popular science, and novels.

DULWICH SCHOOL.—The boys’ library is quite distinct from the ancient and valuable library, with its MSS. and rare Elizabethan books, attached to the college for the use of masters and governors. Though boys may, of course, inspect the chief treasures of this library, they have not ordinary access to it, nor can they borrow books from it. Their special library contains about 6,000 volumes. It is supported by a small grant for the purchase of new books and the rebinding of those in use.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE.—The library of this college consists of 5,000 volumes of miscellaneous books. Subordinate collections of books are maintained, which boys are permitted to read in their own rooms. The largest of these, “The Lane Lending Library,” consists of nearly 3,000 works of fiction, travels, &c. The masters have a large library of their own, and so have the boys in each of the boarding-houses.

FELSTED SCHOOL.—The library at this school is still in an early stage of development. A point that may be mentioned is the separation, not perhaps peculiar to Felsted, of fiction from other subjects. The house masters receive a terminal grant, which they spend as they think fit on novels or “light” literature, each house possessing now some 300 or more books. The school library, on the other hand, contains no novels, and makes purchases to the value of some £30 once in the year, though a few books are bought at other times.

The Education of the Body.

New Methods in Education. By J. Liberty Tadd. (Sampson Low.)

Special Reports on Educational Subjects. Edited by M. E. Sadler. Vols. II. and III. (Education Department.)

ONE of the strongest tendencies in modern education is in the direction of modifying the traditional stress laid upon book-work, and claiming a share in systematic training alike for the hand as the organ of the brain and for the whole body. The movement is one deserving of emphatic encouragement so long as the proper limits are observed; so long, that is to say, as bodily education is regarded as a means, not as an end. It becomes dangerous only when the corpus sanum comes to be treated as an ideal of perfection in itself, and not merely as the environment in which the mens sana may most readily and fruitfully work. It is open to argument whether in the higher grades of education, as represented in the English public schools and universities, these limits have not been of late somewhat overstepped. But it is, we think, certain that in primary education of all kinds the fault has been an opposite one, and that the supplementing of the book, on the one hand, by increased manual training, on the other by increased organisation of physical exercises, requires pushing to a much further extent than has until quite recently been anywhere customary. We welcome, therefore, the stress laid on these matters in two important and elaborate educational publications which have lately reached us, and to which we are glad to direct our readers' attention.

Mr. Tadd's New Methods of Education is of American origin. The writer has had a long experience in manual training, and is now director of the Public School of Industrial Art established at Philadelphia by Mr. C. G. Leland. The exhibit of work done by pupils of this institution at the Chicago Exhibition aroused a good deal of interest, and the present book is an attempt to explain the methods on which Mr. Tadd's instruction is given. Unfortunately Mr. Tadd is not quite as skilful with the pen as he is with the pencil or the blackboard chalk, and the somewhat inflated style of his opening chapters is likely to prejudice the reader against a really useful treatise. The worst offender, indeed, is Dr. Hailmann, who contributes a pretentious preface, in which he sees in the blackboard studies and models of Mr. Tadd's pupils the promise of a new creative art, shall I say of a truly national and specifically American art, in full accordance with the subjective needs and aspirations of this new nation, free from Egyptian and Persian petrifications, from Japanese trivialities, from French frivolities and pessimisms, free from all that is extraneous and effete; an art which is not meant to tickle the idle and dissolute, but to sustain the earnest, which does not revel in the bizarre, but strives to reveal the unity of the true and the beautiful, of joy and vigour; an art which does not drag man into the bogs of self-indulgence, but lifts him to the heights of self-assertion in the service of holiest ideals.

This, written of derivative exercises on the blackboard, is, to put it plainly, buncombe. But when Mr. Tadd gets over his own rhetoric and Dr. Hailmann's, and settles down to the businesslike exposition of his methods and the principles that underlie them, he at once becomes practical and suggestive. Much of what he writes is, no doubt, familiar to students of method in England, but the thoroughness of his exposition, and the innumerable illustrations, two of which we reproduce, that accompany it, cannot fail to be of service. Mr. Tadd points out that much of what passes for manual training in schools really fails to attain the end aimed at. Properly speaking, the object of manual training is to make the hand the obedient and ready servant of the mind, to bring about such habitual and precise co-ordinations of the motor impulses with the directing brain as will enable the interior images to be translated directly and unhesitatingly into outward form. This is not identical with the technical training in trade processes, though it is the best preparation for it.

Authors may send in their MSS. suitable for Volume publication, with a view to immediate consideration.

On the contrary, in the premature acquisition of such technical processes, the all-round education of the peripheral nerves as tools of the senses is too often sacrificed. And again, the best form of manual training is not found in such comparatively mechanical processes as "paper cutting and folding, stick laying, Sloyd, whittling, sewing, planing and joinery work," and the like. Against Sloyd, in particular, for which in some quarters much has been claimed, Mr. Tadd makes a crusade:

Ten courses of Sloyd work will not give the pupil the automatic facility desired, or even fundamental co-ordination of the motor centres of the hands. Throughout the entire course, instruments of precision—the rule, the compass, the try-square, the gauge—are used constantly. Therefore, the eye and the mind never get the unconscious power of grasping magnitudes and proportions so essential in elementary training during the period of growth.

The only manual training worthy of the name, according to Mr. Tadd, is that which is based on freehand drawing. He then proceeds to outline a course, which begins with simple exercises in the elementary forms, such as circles, straight lines, loops, simple leaf-forms and the like, proceeds through various complications of conventional designs, and concludes with studies from life forms, such as birds, fish, and animals. These, as may be seen from the studies of dogs which we reproduce, are broadly and vigorously treated. Part of the work is done on coarse paper of liberal size, part with the chalk on the board; and a free sweep of the arm is insisted on by the teacher. Moreover, Mr. Tadd believes in ambidexterity, and the pupils are taught to use either hand or both at will. They are taught also not merely to copy drawn or natural forms, but to memorise these and to repeat them without a model—an excellent method, if care is taken not to allow too mechanical a use of it. The course of drawing is followed by courses in modelling and wood-carving, in order that by working in three dimensions not the eye only, but the touch and muscular sense may be thoroughly trained. And throughout, the correlation of the manual training with the rest of the pupil's work is insisted on. This seems to us a great step in advance. The liberal use of illustration appealing to the eye—maps, plans, models, casts, magic-lantern slides, and the like—can do much in every branch of learning to supplement the inevitable imperfection of a book study of the subject. It turns, as Newman would have put it, a notional assent to the propositions assimilated into a real one. Even Mr. Squeers had some faint glimmering of this when he made a boy spell "w-i-n-d-e-r, winder," and then sent him to clean it. And how much more is this the case when the pupil's own senses and finger-tips have been exercised on the apprehension and reproduction of the visible forms involved.

There lie before us also two new volumes of The Special Reports on Educational Subjects, which are the first-fruits of the "information bureau" established at the Education Office under Mr. M. E. Sadler. From among the varied and valuable mass of material which is here given for the study of the educational expert we select a series of papers which are germane to the subject of this article. These deal not, like Mr. Tadd, with the training of the motor centres, but with the complementary training of the whole muscular system by means of drill and athletic exercises.

This problem has long ago solved itself in the public schools for boys; but it is still a pressing one in the schools of a similar type for girls, and in the primary schools for both sexes. The first two writers approach it from the former point of view. Mrs. Woodhouse explains the practice in the Girls' Public Day School Company's school at Sheffield. Here the organisation of games is mainly left to the girls themselves, and the only school rule in the matter is that every girl must take at least two hours' daily out-of-door exercise. On the other hand, drill and gymnasium form part of the regular school curriculum. All the girls are periodically examined by a lady doctor, and special exercises in "remedial gymnastics" are prescribed for those who require it. In a boarding-school the physical side of a girl's training is, of course, more under the control of the mistress than it can be in a day school; and a very interesting paper on the subject is contributed by Miss Penelope Lawrence, of the Roedean School, near Brighton. Miss Lawrence appears to have advanced views on the question of girls' athletics. Her pupils are trained in running, swimming, fencing, drill, and gymnastics. But the chief stress is laid upon games proper:

These are, after all, for purposes of exercise, more satisfactory than any other. They have an all-important advantage over drilling and dancing in that they are carried on out of doors—secondly, in that the movements are voluntary, and not to command—over swimming, because they are possible at all times of the year—over riding, because they are inexpensive. They are at once more vigorous exercise and less monotonous than walking, and therefore, considered purely from the point of view of affording physical training and exercise, they fill a place in school life which nothing else fills so well. But they have another and more important function to fill in the training of the character, and under this aspect their importance in school life is second to no other agency we can devise for the children's benefit.

LATERAL TRUNK MOVEMENT.

ARM EXTENSION.

Therefore the young ladies of Roedean School play not only lawn-tennis, but hockey and cricket, like their brothers, and the photographs represent them doing it in impeccable attitudes. Not football, however, because that is "quite unsuited to girls," while the bicycle is barred as incompatible with the organised games.

We have not left ourselves space to discuss the treatment of the same subject in public elementary schools.

TRUNK MOVEMENT.

But Mr. George Sharples sketches the development of games and athletic sports among the boys of these schools all over the country. And descriptions of the methods of drill and gymnastics in use in the Board schools of London, Birmingham and Leeds are contributed by practical instructors. These exercises, which are now strongly encouraged by the Education Department, form a most valuable part of the training given, especially to town children. We have borrowed for reproduction four of the interesting photographs with which these papers are illustrated.

The Renaissance of Girls' Education in England. By Alice Zimmern. (Innes.)

THIS is an interesting summary of the process from the Mangnall's Questions and Child's Guide to Knowledge of fifty years ago to the highly organised and scientific girls' schools and colleges, with their ambitious curriculum and their vigorous physical training, of to-day. Probably the first step in advance was taken by the Clergy Daughters' School at Cowen Bridge, founded by that Mr. Carus Wilson whom, with his institution, Charlotte Brontë so unfairly pilloried in Jane Eyre; and since then new experiments in women's education have thriven and multiplied, reacting in their turn, as Miss Zimmern points out, upon schools which, on the whole, have remained faithful to the older type. Miss Zimmern's survey is, in the main, historical, with a little incidental criticism thrown in, rather than theoretical or classificatory. In successive chapters she describes the initial foundations of Queen's, Bedford, and Cheltenham Colleges; the Report of the Commission of 1865; the starting of High schools; the appropriation of endowments at Birmingham, Bedford, Dulwich, and elsewhere; the Oxford and Cambridge colleges; the degree-giving provincial Universities; and such modernised boarding-schools as St. Leonard's School, at St. Andrews; Roedean, at Brighton, and Wycombe Abbey. This chapter is, perhaps, the most interesting of all, for the institutions described have been less in the eye of the public than either the High schools or the University colleges. But with "boarding" comes in the religious difficulty, and Miss Zimmern should have explained how it is dealt with. Her remaining chapters, on the work of the Polytechnics, County Councils, and School Boards, touch on a branch of education which, while also, in a sense, "secondary," does not stand in any very definite relation to the higher secondary education which has hitherto occupied her. It might, perhaps, have been treated separately altogether. Or if not, the book would have been more useful if it had been preceded by some sketch of the ideally desirable grading of girls, that the reader might gather in reading how far the needs of each grade are met, and what the actual gaps in the whole system are. We should also have thought that more information might be given as to some of the experiments in co-education, to which, though Miss Zimmern does not regard them with a friendly eye, many others look as a possible solution of various problems. University Extension, again, though confessedly a very imperfect and tentative form of education, and probably already in course of being superseded, yet deserves in a historical sketch more attention than Miss Zimmern has given it. In spite of these omissions, however, the book is, on the whole, an adequate record of encouraging activities.

Herbart's Letters and Lectures on Education. Translated by Henry M. and Emmie Felkin. (Sonnenschein.)

IN Germany, and also in America, your scientific educationalist is, nine times out of ten, a Herbartian. The English teacher is, constitutionally, unwilling to tie himself to one system or one method; but for him, too, Herbart is rapidly becoming, with Locke and with Froebel, one of the masters. Indeed, you need not accept Herbart's philosophy as a whole to recognise the importance and value of his life-long contention that a sound education must depend ultimately on sound ethics and sound psychology. The present volume may be taken as supplementary to the more formal treatise on The Science of Education, which Mr. and Mrs. Felkin have already translated. The two works which it contains, though conceived in the same spirit, belong to opposite ends of the author's career. The Letters on Education, with others not now extant, were written, in 1797-1799, as educational reports on the sons of one Herr Steiger, of Interlaken, to whom the young Herbart, fresh from Jena, was acting as tutor. They show him feeling for principles and a method, but with the main spirit of his educational theories already mature. The Lectures on Education, on the other hand, were written in 1835, six years before Herbart's death, and may be regarded as a sort of summary and, in some points, a completion of his greater treatise. Serious students of education should be grateful to Mr. and Mrs. Felkin for their close and literal rendering of Herbart's difficult, exactly-reasoned German. The book is not light reading, but it is worth the pains.

The Local Examination History. By R. S. Pringle, LL.D., (John Heywood.)

A BOOK that has reached the eighteenth edition must surely serve its purpose. It is, of course, a mere epitome, attempting to compress into less than 200 pages all that a student ought to know about his own country. It is not, however, ideal. The field is most extensive, the knowledge sketchy, and the "shreds and patches" of history, literature, and biography are thrown together in a very exasperating way.

England and the Hundred Years' War. By C. W. C. Oman, M.A., F.S.A. (Blackie & Son.)

THE present volume completes Mr. Oman's series of six little manuals, each (except the first) dealing with a period of a hundred and fifty years or so. The editor makes out a good case for his method. This particular period is one that can well be dealt with apart; and he has told the almost epic story with great skill. Constitutional progress, whether in England or France, is noted with as much care and fulness as the glittering deeds of war; the faults and weaknesses of the chief actors in the drama are marked with perfect fairness; and full justice is done to the firmness and skill with which French kings and commanders gradually won back the complete freedom of their land from an almost hopeless state. Some useful maps and tables make up a workmanlike handbook.

The Growth of Greater Britain. By F. B. Kirkman, B.A., Oxon. (Blackie & Son.)

THE new "Raleigh Reader" is a capital book, and most fittingly appears at a time when efforts are being made to knit our great empire more closely together, and to cement our friendship with the great kindred republic which George III. and his ministers alienated. The story of the growth of our empire is well and stirringly told, and is illustrated by many a sketch map and many a noble face.

French.

Le Roi des Montagnes. Par E. About. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Thomas Logie, Ph.D. (John Hopkins Univ.). (Boston: D. C. Heath & Co.; London: Isbister.)

AGAIN we have a pretty edition of About's delightful story, with its bright, biting sarcasm. The business-like brigand, hand in glove with the police and the monks; the English ladies; the German man of science, who calmly poisons the whole robber band—again delight us. The notes are few, and deal only with points of translation, and therefore the book is scarcely meant for class use.

Mon Oncle et mon Curé. Par Jean de la Brète. By E. C. Goldberg, M.A. (Macmillan.)

A PRETTY little story of the mental and moral growth of an orphaned girl, under the guardianship first of an odious aunt and then of a wise, kindly uncle. The book is a welcome addition to its series. The characters of the story are delicately drawn. The notes are good, and the system of exercises, oral and written, based on the text, makes the edition a valuable school book.

Dent's Second French Book. By S. Alge and Walter Rippmann. (Dent.)

THIS little book is written throughout in French. Apart from the Hints on Teaching French, a companion volume, it is not easy to understand the method. But the anecdotes, and especially the longer story, "La Tâche du Petit Pierre," are delightful. The latter reads like a couple of chapters from Sans Famille. There are dialogues, exercises on verbs, and the like; but a systematic grammar seems required, or at least a table of irregular verbs.

French Commercial Correspondence. By Ladislas Soleil. Vol. I., Preliminary; Vol. II., Intermediate Course. (Kegan Paul.)

THESE two books form a very good and thorough course of instruction on a highly important subject. The system of commerce and its technical language are carefully and clearly explained. Abundant practice is given in correspondence, in commercial arithmetic, and in suitable French unseen passages for translation. These last are all strictly connected with the main topic of the books. The second volume ends with a score of Oxford Local Examination papers on commercial French. There are no English notes; nor is there any vocabulary of commercial terms. This last would, we think, be a useful addition; and we should have liked some specimens of actual French script, for the character of French calligraphy is quite different from our own. Such books as these should do much to wipe away the reproach that English clerks are unable to conduct the foreign correspondence of their employers.

German.

Goethe's Iphigenie auf Tauris. With Introduction and Notes. By Charles A. Eggert, Ph.D. (New York: The Macmillan Co. London: Macmillan.)

THIS is an excellent edition of Goethe's drama, the greatest production of the Greek spirit under modern conditions of thought. Like Keats, Goethe was, in one aspect of his genius, an Athenian born out of due time, and in the Iphigenie he seems to breathe the very spirit of Sophocles. Mr. Eggert's learned and thorough Introduction gives full information on all points connected with the genesis of the play, the history and variations of the myth, and Goethe's ethical conception and purpose, and his notes give every help for the interpretation. A concise bibliography and index complete the book. The printing is all that can be desired, and the system of numbering the lines is very helpful. In a few places the English might be mended: "outranks" (p. xv.) is less good than surpasses, "besides" (p. xviii.) is put for the preposition beside, and "Christ-deed" is a monstrosity. Surely, too (p. vii.), "Pluto, the synonym of wealth," is a slip for Plutus, though the latter god is not concerned in the subject-matter!

Lower German. By Louis Lubovius. (William Blackwood & Sons.)

THIS little book should be of much service both to teachers and learners, and should, as the author says, be used along with a good elementary grammar. The larger part is an easy, well-chosen reading-book, the matter being such as should interest and amuse all children. Then follows a succinct accidence, with copious exercises, and then connected prose for translation into German. The use of Roman characters in the vocabulary and for some of the reading extracts, and the etymological suggestions, are useful features; and the addition of a few songs with Sol-fa notation (pp. 116 et seq.) is a pleasant thing in the book.

Greek and Latin.

The Iliad of Homer. Books XIII. to XXIV. Edited by Walter Leaf, Litt.D., and M. A. Bayfield, M.A. (Macmillan.)

THE present volume completes what is almost an ideal edition of the Iliad for school use. In two points only do we think it could be mended: it does not seem quite fair to teach the destructive theories of Lachmann and others without mention of the high authorities (e.g., Monro and Gladstone) ranged on the opposite side, and the use of the peculiar Greek type in the notes is of doubtful advantage for learners. Having said this, we have nothing but praise for the book. The Introduction, especially the long and careful grammatical part, is admirable, and the sections on the subjunctive and optative, and the uses of the particles καὶ (ν) and ἐν, deserve special consideration. The notes are very full, and contain a vast amount of learning. Every point of the poem is discussed as it arises, whether it be of philology, the social state of the people, or the manners, accoutrements, and fighting methods of the heroes in the great siege. The Appendix on Homeric armour is learned and interesting, especially that part which treats (after Reichel) of the shield, and the beautiful workmanship of the gold cups of Vaphio (p. 452) gives a high idea of the civilisation which produced them.

The Æneid of Virgil. Book I. Edited by A. Sidgwick, M.A. (Cambridge: At the University Press.)

MR. SIDGWICK'S edition is a handy and elegant little book, complete in itself, with vocabulary, informing notes, and an admirable Introduction. He has managed to compress into his limited space a wonderful amount of good scholarship, and to show besides insight into and sympathy with the consummate art and poetry of his author. The little summaries in the notes are a great help, and the references to parallel passages light up the commentary. But in the first line primus is surely "at the first," not "first"—which Æneas was not; and at l. 637 we think the balance is in favour of dei (Conington's reading), and not dii, which Mr. Sidgwick prefers.

Cicero in Catilinam. Book I. Edited by J. H. Flather, M.A. (Cambridge: At the University Press.)

MR. FLATHER has done a very good piece of work in small compass. A careful Introduction gives all that is necessary for understanding the history and politics of the time, the notes are full and scholarly, and the table of syntactical usages is excellent. A good vocabulary completes the edition, than which no better book could be used as an introduction to the great orator-statesman of Rome.

Ovid. Vol. III. By J. P. Postgate. (London: George Bell & Sons; Cambridge: Deighton, Bell & Co.)

SCHOLARS will welcome this pretty little volume, completing the text of Ovid, and containing the Fasti, Tristia, &c. Its correctness is vouched for by the names of the editors, Mr. Postgate being editor-in-chief. We are delighted to see the publishers adding new volumes to the dainty series of Cambridge Greek and Latin texts, long interrupted. They are far handier and nicer than any other editions which we know.

The Beginner's Latin Grammar and Exercises. By Percy H. Frost, M.A. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

IN this new Latin Grammar, Part I., more than half the book is taken up with a systematic clearing away of the difficulties a beginner meets with. This is done clearly and simply, and was originally a book by itself. To this has now been added an accidence, with all the principal paradigms and the common irregular verbal forms, and fifty short elementary exercises with vocabularies, &c. We are afraid the book would not be quite easy to teach from, and it seems a mistake to put the abstract Part I. before the concrete Part II. Mr. Frost ought to have pointed out the distinction between pronouns and pronominal adjectives (p. 34). We have looked in vain for parco among his verbs, and we think he might have got his mythology from some later authority than good old Lemprière.

Science.

Biology.

The Structure and Classification of Birds. By Frank E. Beddard. (Longmans. 21s. net.)

An Elementary Text-book of Botany. By Prof. Sydney H. Vines. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

MR. BEDDARD'S account of the structure of the different groups of birds, together with his scheme of classification, constitute a valuable piece of ornithological work. The volume is, indeed, one of the two most important contributions to ornithology in 1898, the other being the final volume of the British Museum Catalogue of Birds, completed after a period of twenty-five years. It suffices for general purposes to know a bird as an animal with a covering of feathers, and it is a fact that no other animal has any structures comparable to a well-developed feather. But the student of science requires to be acquainted with the anatomical characters of the various kinds of birds, in order that he may see the variations of an organ in the different groups, and discern affinities useful for classification. This information Mr. Beddard imparts; and he deals with the subject not as a compiler, but as an investigator whose contributions are worthy additions to the scientific material produced by Garrod and W. A. Forbes, his predecessors in the office of Prosector of the Zoological Society. The volume is profusely illustrated, and is in every respect a useful treatise in which all matters of importance concerning bird anatomy are considered.

The word "elementary" is an elastic quantity when applied to text-books of science. It is used to designate sixpenny books for Board School pupils, and volumes of more than six hundred pages, like that of Prof. Vines's. This work is an abridged and revised edition of the author's Students' Text-book, which occupies about two hundred more pages. To compress the facts and conceptions of botanical science into a smaller space than is given to the present volume would be unsatisfactory to the serious student, for whom the work is intended, and who is advised not to read it through as he would a volume of fiction, but to take up one of the four parts on morphology, anatomy, physiology, and classification, and consider it in close relation with the other three. By following this plan of study, a sound and scientific knowledge of the most important facts concerning the structures and functions of the different parts of plants will be obtained.

Geology.

Earth Sculpture; or, The Origin of Land Forms. By Prof. James Geikie. (John Murray.)

Seismology. By Prof. John Milne. (Kegan Paul.)

Geology for Beginners. By Prof. W. W. Watts. (Macmillan.)

SUBTERRANEAN action has upheaved mountain chains; tilted, compressed, fractured, and folded rocks; and caused impressive volcanic outbursts which have from time to time covered regions with molten rock and coarse fragments; but rain and rivers and other graving tools of Nature are constantly in use carving out the features of the landscape, and it is to them, rather than the forces acting within the earth's crust, that we owe the present configuration of the surface. Prof. Geikie's work provides an excellent means of learning how these various agents of change are concerned in the origin of land-forms. Written for readers unfamiliar with the language of geology, technical words and expressions have been avoided as far as possible, and numerous instructive diagrams (mainly sections illustrating mountain structure) have been included. A valuable introductory treatise on the development of land-forms has thus been produced.

Signs of indifferent editing of papers previously published are not wanting in Prof. Milne's work; but the volume is so rich in items of interest concerning the sighs and shudders of "the old beldam earth" that any imperfections of plan and arrangement are readily overlooked. In no work can more information upon the methods and results of seismology be found, and none deals with so many aspects of the subject.

Prof. Watts has produced the most satisfactory beginners' manual of geology yet published. Sound in statement, profusely illustrated, with questions (which critics scorn, but teachers and students use) at the end of each chapter, the volume is an ideal text-book for the use of students taking up the scientific study of the earth and the materials which enter into its composition.

Chemistry.

A History of Chemistry. By Dr. Ernest von Meyer. Translated by Dr. McGowan. (Macmillan.)

An Experimental Course of Chemistry for Agricultural Students. By T. S. Dymond. (Edward Arnold.)

EVERY school of science and technology should possess a copy of Prof. von Meyer's inspiring history of chemistry. The first English version, which appeared nearly eight years ago, met with a cordial reception, and the present edition, with numerous additions and alterations, is even more worthy of attention. The student will derive inspiration and encouragement from the volume, and the general reader who turns to it will find little difficulty in following the development of chemical science, as it is here presented, from the earliest times to the present day. The volume is an introduction to the study of chemistry, as well as a history, and is the one essential book in the chemical department of a library.

Mr. Dymond has prepared a good and practical little manual of laboratory work for students of agricultural chemistry. The course he describes has been successfully followed in the Central Laboratories of the Essex County Council at Chelmsford, and the young agriculturalist who works through it will gain valuable knowledge of the properties of the chemical substances with which agriculture is concerned. With such an intellectual equipment as the volume affords, the younger generation of British farmers will be well able to understand and use modern developments of agriculture.

Mathematics.

Infinitesimal Analysis. By Prof. W. B. Smith. (Macmillan.)

The Tutorial Algebra. By W. Briggs and Prof. G. H. Bryan. (W. B. Clive.)

Trigonometry at a Glance. By G. W. Usill and F. J. Browne. (George Philip & Son.)

IF a series of fractions such as $\frac{1}{2} + \frac{1}{4} + \frac{1}{8} + \frac{1}{16}$, &c., be added together, it is evident that the result can never amount to 1, however many fractions of this kind there may be in the progression. The total varies in magnitude according to the length of the series, and may thus be brought as close as we please to some constant value (in this case 1) without ever coinciding with that constant. The difference between the variable quantity and the constant which represents its limit is described in the language of higher mathematics as an infinitesimal, and Prof. Smith's volume is concerned with the properties, relations, and functions of such magnitudes for cases in which real variables are involved. The processes of differentiation and integration are clearly explained, and practical applications of them are pointed out. Teachers of the calculus should find the volume a serviceable means of advancing "the mastery of the most powerful weapon of thought yet devised by the wit of man."

The advanced course of algebra contained in the book by Mr. Briggs and Prof. Bryan is based upon a volume written by Prof. Radhakrishnan. Its Indian origin thus gives it a unique position among English school-books. Numerous alterations and modifications have, however, been made to render the work suitable for our public examinations; and students who are familiar with the elementary properties of quadratic equations and progressions will find the present edition a helpful guide.

The simple contrivance designed by Messrs. Usill and Browne enables the student to give concrete expression to the various trigonometrical functions and to represent graphically the functions of an angle and its complement. It should be of service to students who have a difficulty in grasping abstract principles.

Philosophy and Psychology.

The Living Organism: An Introduction to the Problems of Biology. By Alfred Earl. (Macmillan.)

Psychology in the Schoolroom. By T. F. G. Dexter and A. H. Garlick. (Longmans.)

An Introductory Logic. By Prof. J. E. Creighton. (Macmillan.)

MR. EARL'S book is concerned with the philosophy of science. It expresses many simple facts in elaborate phraseology, and aims at showing "that though chemical and physical changes enter largely into the composition of vital activity, there is much in the living organism that is outside the range of these operations."

The application of the principles of psychology to methods of teaching is much to be commended, and Messrs. Dexter and Garlick's volume is a worthy effort in this direction. They are not so strong in their psychology as in their pedagogy; but, notwithstanding this, their work is an orderly and useful aid to the duties of the schoolroom.

The main conceptions of modern logical theory are made intelligible to elementary students by Prof. Creighton. The first section of the book is concerned with the syllogism and its parts, the second with inductive methods, and the third with the nature of thought. The volume is constructed upon a more philosophical plan than is usually followed, and it makes a very satisfactory text-book for students of formal logic.

IN PREPARATION.—READY AT ONCE.

The Thrilling Story of the Adventures of Lieut. Johansen, the sole companion of Dr. Nansen after leaving the "Fram."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

Profusely Illustrated with Photographs.

WITH NANSEN in the NORTH.

By LIEUT. H. JOHANSEN.

The success of Dr. Nansen's expedition was due in no small degree to Lieut. Johansen's wonderful powers of endurance and indomitable pluck. Johansen's story has all the interest of a romance and is essentially a popular account of the great enterprise. The adventures and vicissitudes make up a romance of real life which has never been exceeded by any previous trustworthy story of travel and adventure, and it will undoubtedly prove one of the most popular books of travel of the year.

THE IMPERIAL HERITAGE.

By ERNEST E. WILLIAMS.

"Just the sort of work not only to stimulate the Imperialist spirit which is now so rampant all over the kingdom, but to give Englishmen a far more intelligent idea of their Imperial birthright than the majority of them show any signs of possessing."—Publishers' Circular.

"Mr. Williams's book is well written and very readable—the more that he makes us see wonderful growth—the 'making of nations' as it were, before our very eyes. That is an aid to education, to a sense of the duties of citizenship, and therefore, and more especially to the young, we would commend this book."—London Review.

ETHEL TURNER'S NEW BOOK.

THE CAMP AT WANDINONG.

"Ethel Turner has given us in 'The Camp at Wandinong' such an insight into the thoughts and nature of childhood as is nothing short of marvellous. It is no exaggeration to say that in our experience no truer representations of child life have ever been brought before the public. Mrs. Curlew's pathos is of that simple and intimate description that will find its way straight to the hearts of her readers."—Ladies' Field.

THE CAMP AT WANDINONG.

"We can but indicate the beauty of the story, the lovely character of the mother of the two children, who are captivating in the freshness of their comic and yet moving charm; the appeal to our hearts of the touchy, even cranky, toil-worn father; and the sudden glory of fidelity, disinterestedness, and fine romance with which their humble friend Peterson is invested. The little girl Dorrie is an unrivalled child. A memorable story."—The World.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR. Uniform with the above.

"Miss Ethel Turner is Miss Alcott's true successor. The same healthy spirited tone is visible which girls and boys recognised and were grateful for in 'Little Women' and 'Little Men,' the same absence of primness, and the same love of adventure."—Bookman.

JUVENAL.—SATIRES. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and Index, by J. D. DUFF, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. 5s.

Extract from Preface.—"Perhaps it is reason enough for adding another to the many English editions of Juvenal, that all our recent editors have excluded the Sixth Satire, the most brilliant in detail and by far the longest of Juvenal's poems. The present edition includes 530 lines of this celebrated piece. The Second and Ninth Satires, some paragraphs of the Sixth, and a few lines in other Satires, are not included in this edition."

Athenæum.—"One of the best school books which we have seen for some time.....The notes are capital."

Our Awards for 1898.

The "Crowned" Books.

THE task of selecting two books of signal merit published during 1898 for our annual crowning has proved to be more difficult than that which confronted us last year, when we awarded one hundred guineas to Mr. Stephen Phillips for his volume of poems, and fifty guineas to Mr. Henley for his essay on Burns. Our aim is, above all, to encourage: to seek for promise, sincerity, and thoroughness in literary art rather than to acknowledge fulfilment. After carefully weighing various claims, we have decided to divide the amount at our disposal into three awards of Fifty Guineas each:

FIFTY GUINEAS to Mr. Sidney Lee for A Life of William Shakespeare.

FIFTY GUINEAS to Mr. Maurice Hewlett for The Forest Lovers.

FIFTY GUINEAS to Mr. Joseph Conrad for Tales of Unrest.

Mr. Sidney Lee and his "Life of Shakespeare."

THE criticism of Mr. Lee's Life of Shakespeare has mainly been directed to a single point, which looms large in the public eye. While combating the somewhat baseless—or, at least, highly conjectural—theory of the Sonnets which the biographer has woven as a heterogeneous patch into the main web of his work, there has been some danger of forgetting what a real and exceptional achievement this work itself constitutes. Our own review was not altogether free from this reproach, and we are glad to have this further opportunity to emphasise our sense of the signal service which Mr. Lee by his labours has done to Shakespearian scholarship. The ideal which he has set before himself, and which he has in very considerable measure realised, may perhaps be best stated in his own words. It was "to supply within a brief compass an exhaustive and well-arranged statement of the facts of Shakespeare's career, achievements, and reputation, that shall reduce conjecture to the smallest dimensions consistent with coherence, and shall give verifiable references to all the original sources of information." The difficulties which stood in the way of accomplishing the scheme thus modestly sketched are, probably, obvious only to the expert.

Shakespeareology—more, perhaps, than any other branch of literary history—is handicapped less even by the character of the material with which it has to deal, than by the zeal, not always according to discretion, of its devotees. Whoso will summarise it and set it in order has in the first place to face the formidable bulk of his predecessors' researches. He has to deal with the transactions of four or five learned societies which occupy themselves entirely, or almost entirely, with the subject; while at the back of these comes a second array of special studies and monographs written in the tongues of all peoples, and mostly in German. Secondly, he finds that the authors of many of these have been antiquaries of the worst type, with a singular capacity for drawing illegitimate inferences from unverifiable premises, and, generally speaking, for illustrating all the fallacies which ever entered into the heart of mortal researcher to conceive. Thirdly, what the blunderer has not trampled under foot has been beset with snares by the forger. The discredited inventions of Ireland have by this time disappeared from the books. But the more ingenious and no less baneful fabrications of Collier, and in a humbler degree of John Jordan and George Steevens, still continue to puzzle the unwary. Like the fabled upas-tree, which, indeed, was one of them, they have shed a poisonous influence over the writings of more than a century. Even as late as 1896, no less a scholar than Mr. Stopford Brooke solemnly repeats the statement that in 1576 the Earl of Leicester's servants built the Blackfriars Theatre.

And, finally, when you have tackled Germans, antiquaries, and forgers, you have to meet the biggest and most terrible giant of all—the guesser. In the past facile conjecture has run riot over the whole spacious domain of Shakespearian research. Biographer after biographer, painting in sentimental or cynical colours, as the case may be, has evolved out of his inner consciousness a Shakespeare who bears about as much resemblance to the Shakespeare of any other as he probably does to the man himself. The rose-red Shakespeare of the popular preacher, the blackened Shakespeare of the Baconians, the metaphysician who "is Germany," the Nietzschean sinner of the realistic school—these are the phantoms which beset the way. To curb this license of conjecture, without denying its legitimate scope, to strike the line between the aridity of a précis of documents and the flamboyance of a romance, has probably been the worst of Mr. Lee's task.

But through this, as well as the former ordeals, he has come felicitously. His book, beyond all others on the subject, is sound as to its facts and cautious as to its inferences: yet it reads easily into the bargain and is not lacking in colour. It is honest and shapely work, worthy alike of a scholar and a lover of fine letters. For a generation to come, it should be a standard authority, the indispensable "Life" for the average man, the habitual reference-book even for the student who likes to keep Halliwell-Phillips and the other "sources" on his shelves. Mr. Lee has a right to be proud of his achievement, coming as it does to crown a long series of Elizabethan biographies which he has found time in the midst of his more strictly editorial functions to write for the Dictionary over whose destinies he presides. No man, as editor or writer, has deserved better either of scholars or of the reading public as a whole.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett and "The Forest Lovers."

MR. HEWLETT has a brave front, and the brave front is not too common in English literature. Borrow had it, Whitman had it, Stevenson had it. Possessing it, one essays the open road with head high and a firm step, glorying in movement, in the keen air, and the hot sun and the singing birds. Hills are nothing, because from their summits so much fair world is to be seen. That is Mr. Hewlett's attitude. His two 1898 books—The Forest Lovers and Pan and the Young Shepherd—show us a man who believes in living life to the full—cleanly, healthily, thoroughly. His young shepherd in Pan expresses it: "I got up the mountain edge, and from the top saw the world stretched out—cornlands and forest, the river winding among meadow-flats, and right off, like a hem of the sky, the moving sea, with snatches of foam, and large ships reaching forward, out-bound. And then I thought no more, but my heart leapt to meet the wind, and I ran, and I ran. I felt my legs under me, I felt the wind buffet me, hit me on the cheek; the sun shone, the bees swept past me singing; and I too sang, shouted, 'World, world, I am coming!'" A man with such spirit as this cannot but make good literature. We are well aware that Mr. Hewlett's forms are borrowed, that he remembers Malory and others; but he has made them his own, has breathed his own life into them, given them his own robust gaiety and modernity.

It is this modernity which helps to make his inventions so credible. Isoult and Prosper are moderns in an archaic but wondrously fresh world. Neanias and Geron and Aglaë are moderns. All think as we do and act as we do; and the result is that to put ourselves in their places is so simple that no one who has read Mr. Hewlett would feel surprised if on a quiet woodland walk a gentle knight suddenly appeared, pricking o'er the plain, or a fat bare-foot friar trudged merrily before, or a gentle lady called for succour from a wayside thicket, or even if, leaning idly over a gate, a shagged and blinking god were discerned, with eyes like darkling water, and a gnarly tree-bole face, and goat's feet. Mr. Hewlett's fidelity to the human fact has made it all credible. No tapestry-effects for him, no low-pulsed, wistful maidens, and pale, melancholy youths. His world is a world of vigorous minds and vigorous bodies, of blows and laughter, of sunshine and love. Most of the archaists have dealt with vacuums. Mr. Hewlett has insisted upon air. It blows through all his pages. His people breathe it and are strong: we can see all round them. It is partly this return to nature which makes him so welcome. For, fantastic as their setting may be, and filled with conventional improbabilities, his men and women behave as natural men and women would. Mr. Hewlett, in short, puts the body in its right place.

Two more points: his tenderness and his pictorial richness. Tenderness belongs to the strong, and Mr. Hewlett has it. Some of the passages between Prosper and Isoult, Neanias and Aglaë, are of exquisite beauty "I am with you, Aglaë," says the young shepherd to the poor dumb earth-daughter; "I will teach you love; and love, they say, is life. Happy love, therefore, is blessed life. . . . O Aglaë, will you cry again? Sure, you cannot see me for tears. You tremble again, your lips quiver, sobs are in your throat. Your head on my shoulder, dear: there, that's happy, that's happy. Oh, what a beating heart! Look now, Aglaë, cry your fill; don't be ashamed—I am not looking at you. I felt a tear on my arm; I know your eyes are brimming. Cry, cry, my bird, you will be better after. Have no fear. I hold you close—side by side: we will be nearer yet—heart to heart some day." That is from Mr. Hewlett's pastoral, from which we quote here, in preference to his romance, for the reason that fewer readers know it. But The Forest Lovers has such passages too. Particularly rich is The Forest Lovers in pictures. We do not want to see it illustrated, but an artist would find it filled with material. There is, for example, that early-morning scene where Isoult, creeping warily from Prosper's side, steals into the heart of the herd of deer and draws milk from one of the does: a scene repeated with more detail later in the book. But on almost every page there is some vivid little glimpse touched in with sure colour, some gem of landscape.

Here we must stop. Mr. Hewlett is so various and vivacious that it would be possible to write much more; but we have so recently dealt with his work that to say more would be repetition. It is enough here to have drawn attention to certain of his more striking qualities, and to remark that he seems to us to stand out among the imaginative writers of 1898 as a vital force.

Mr. Joseph Conrad and "Tales of Unrest."

MR. CONRAD, in the five years or so that he has spent on land, setting down for our beguilement some of the stories that had come to him during his life at sea, has produced only four books; but they have been, in the fullest sense of the word, written. It might be said that the work of no novelist now working gives so much evidence of patient elaboration of style, without, however, leaving any sense of elaborateness. Mr. Conrad's art conceals art. With the nicest precision of epithet (a precision the more remarkable when we recollect that he lived so long at sea) Mr. Conrad tells his tales of strong men fighting the elements, of emotional crises, of settlers in foreign lands among alien people, by the conflict of the East and the West, of savagery and civilisation. This contrast between his own calm and the turbulence of his subject-matter lends his work a peculiarly impressive character. If his work reminds us of anyone it is Turgenev. His aloofness is Turgenev's. But his poetry, his outlook on life, his artistic conscience—these are his own.

Another of Mr. Conrad's distinguishing qualities that he keeps man in his place. He has an eye ever vigilant both for the transitory persons of his drama and for the permanent forces at their back. He blends human beings and nature. The puppet never fills the universe, as with certain other novelists. Everything is related and harmonised. This comprehensiveness of vision, this amplitude of outlook, makes Mr. Conrad more than just a story teller. He seems to us to have some of the attributes of the Greek tragic dramatists. He has their irony. He sees so much at once, and is so conscious of the infinitesimal place a man can fill. Hence his work belongs never to cheerful literature; it is sombre, melancholy, searching. Yet Mr. Conrad is poet too. At the same time that he is aware of man's shortcomings he is profoundly in love with his capacities for grandeur, with his potential nobility. He recognises that an emotion may be as beautiful as a night of stars, a passion as tremendous as a typhoon.

It is Mr. Conrad's achievement to have brought the East to our very doors, not only its people—others have done that conspicuously well—but its feeling, its glamour, its beauty and wonder. He is one of the notable literary colonists. He has annexed the Malay Peninsula for us. With him it is not merely an array of names and ethnological facts, it is the real transference to paper of something of the very heart of the country, the nation, described. Here, from "Karain," in Tales of Unrest, is a passage from a picture of a Malayan paradise. The writer is observing the land from the sea—looking upon it for the first time:

A torrent wound about like a dropped thread. Clumps of fruit-trees marked the villages; slim palms put their nodding heads together above the low houses; dried palm-leaf roofs shone afar, like roofs of gold, behind dark colonades of tree-trunks; figures passed vivid and vanishing; the smoke of fires stood upright above the masses of flowering bushes; bamboo fences glittered, running away in broken lines between the fields. A sudden cry on the shore sounded plaintive in the distance, and ceased abruptly, as if stifled in the downpour of sunshine; a puff of breeze made a flash of darkness on the smooth water, touched our faces, and became forgotten. Nothing moved. The sun blazed down into a shadowless hollow of colours and stillness.

This description opens a new world to the untravelled reader. It is the East. And Mr. Conrad's works have many such passages, quietly written, deliberate and reserved, yet full of atmosphere and the savour of the land. He makes us see it and, what is more, feel it; and, having done so, we are—thus familiarised with the conditions—in tune for the story, or the incident that is to follow.

During the year just closed Mr. Conrad has given us not only Tales of Unrest, the volume which we crown, but also a short story—Youth: a Narrative—which appeared in Blackwood in the summer. Both contributions strengthen our opinion that much is to be expected from him. Youth is merely the record of an ill-starred voyage, yet there is magic in it. In a way it is Mr. Conrad's most humanly touching work. We wish to associate Youth with Tales of Unrest in this award.

Spenser's Tercentenary.

KING-STREET, Westminster, will soon be obliterated from the map of London. That block of buildings which separated it a few weeks ago from Parliament-street is level with the ground, and it is certain that, in the reconstruction which is to follow, King-street will be relegated to the limbo of forgotten London thoroughfares. A sad ending, that, for a notable street. In olden days it was the only route from Whitehall to the Houses of Parliament, and in one of the numerous inns which dotted the street in the sixteenth century Edmund Spenser died. That was on January 16, 1599, a date which Monday next will bring round for the three hundredth time.

Spenser was starved to death—according to Ben Jonson. The legend was believed for many generations, but we may celebrate the poet's tercentenary free of any sombre thoughts which credence in such a story would surely bring. As Lowell tersely put it, "Spenser's misery was exaggerated by succeeding poets, who used him to point a moral, and from the shelter of his tomb launched many a shaft of sarcasm at an unappreciative public." We know now that in the October before his death Spenser had been appointed Sheriff of the county of Cork, and that instead of being driven out of Ireland by Tyrone's rebellion he came back to London as the special messenger of Sir Thomas Norreys, President of Munster. Is it believable that such an official of Government, on such an errand, would have been allowed literally to starve to death?

Idle, too, is all that talk which speaks of Spenser's death as taking place in an "obscure tavern in King-street." It is clear from many old documents that King-street was the recognised resort of all special messengers to the Court, and there is Stow's testimony that it was "a very great thoroughfare," and that "for the accommodation of such as come to town in the terms, here are in this street some good inns for their reception." There was a time when any poet dying at all mysteriously was made to end his career in an obscure tavern.

Spenser's school has been discovered within recent years. While investigating the Townley MSS., Mr. R. B. Knowles came upon an account-book setting forth the wise uses to which the wealth of one Richard Nowell had been put, and among the names inscribed there he found that of the author of the Faerie Queene. Further examination showed that it was as a scholar of the Merchant Taylors' School Spenser became a sharer in Robert Nowell's bounty, and that discovery filled in the blank which had hitherto existed in the poet's biography from his birth to his going to Cambridge. Having found his school, it was easy to identify Spenser's schoolmaster in the person of Dr. Richard Mulcaster, who had charge of the Merchant Taylors' School for many years from its foundation in 1561. And a notable master he must have been if we may credit Andrew Fuller's characteristic picture of his methods of tuition :

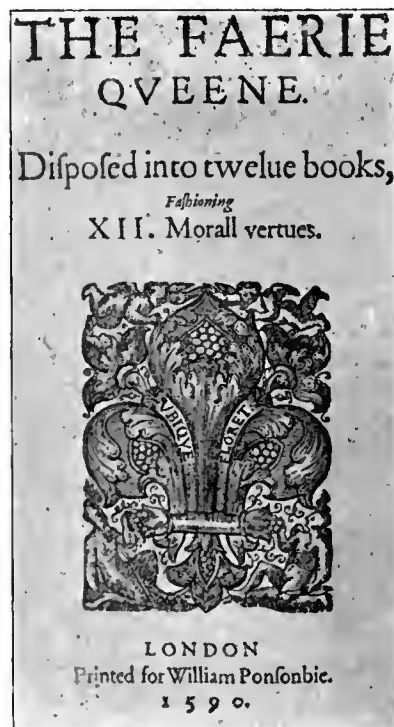

In a morning he would exactly and plainly construe and parse the lesson to his scholars ; which done, he slept his hour (custom made him critical to proportion it) in his desk in the school, but woe be to the scholar that slept the while. Awaking, he heard them accurately ; and Atropos might be persuaded to pity as soon as he to pardon, where he found just fault. The prayers of cockering mothers prevailed with him as much as the requests of indulgent fathers, rather increasing than mitigating his severity on their offending children ; but his sharpness was the better endured because impartial ; and many excellent scholars were bred under him.

No authority has ever judged the question of Spenser's portrait in a satisfactory manner. That which has usually been selected for engraving is known as the Lord Chesterfield portrait, while the photograph given herewith was taken from the oil painting in the possession of Earl Spencer. These two may be regarded as representative of the different classes of Spenser portraits, and it may be said at once that the types are utterly beyond reconciliation. As there is nothing of vraisemblance about the Lord Chesterfield type, we are driven to the Althorp type of necessity. Earl Spencer's portrait is a copy by Sir Henry Raeburn of the original at Dupplin Castle. Towards the close of the last century there died at Mallow a lineal descendant of the poet, and he was credited with the possession of an original portrait of Spenser. Of that canvas, however, nothing is known. But a guess may be hazarded. It is believed that Mr. Aubrey Harcourt, of Nuneham Courtney, has an original portrait of Spenser, and it may be that that is the one formerly at Mallow. In any case, the question of the poet's likeness offers a capital subject for some student willing to be rewarded with small returns for an infinite amount of trouble.

According to some family papers recently brought to light by the Historical MSS. Commission, there was an Edmund Spenser living in Ireland in the middle of the last century, and in one of his letters he expressed the conviction that if he could be brought to the notice of the Duke of Marlborough his Grace would procure him some employment "on account of my family, and in consideration of my being descended from the famous poet of this name." That scheme not prospering, Edmund Spenser proposed to edit his great ancestor's works, and actually prepared a specimen page and a receipt form for subscribers. A year later someone writes : "Pray, what has become of Mr. Spenser? Will he or will he not go on with the publication of Spenser's works? I am much teased by such subscribers as I got him, to return the money, which I have promised soon to do unless he immediately proceeds." Edmund Spenser, edited by Edmund Spenser, is still unknown to English literature.

Books One Does Not Read.

"Does anyone read Rasselas to-day?" the ACADEMY asks in noticing the new edition of that preposterous romance. I am quite sure that nobody does. It is mercifully brief ; but it is not quite the sort of book one would take upon a fishing excursion or a honeymoon, nor is it to be supposed that it is to be found in the library of the Emperor Menelek, although the absurd hero purports to have been a prince of Abyssinia. Most men of letters, perhaps, read or try to read it once in their lives—usually during that early stage of their pilgrimage when they have not yet learned what an uncommon amount of rubbish is contained in books once reputed classical. As to the man in the street, he has probably never heard of it—and his state is the more gracious. For the sake of the Vincent Press I may hope, however, that there are a few amateurs who will buy their book, if only for the sake of the white vellum binding and the sage-green ribbons and the amiable eccentricities of its typographical arrangement. They will not buy it for the sake of its contents, unless they should be consumed with curiosity, in which case the usual punishment of that original sin will not delay to fall upon them.

But Rasselas is only one of the many books which, by convention, we call classical, although they are very poor stuff. I do not suppose anybody will resent my describing Dr. Johnson's little book as mere pompous nonsense; but is the Vicar of Wakefield much better? As it chanced, I never read the adventures of Dr. Primrose and his family until I had reached years of some maturity; and I shall never read them again. It is beyond measure astonishing to me that a great deal of Goldsmith's reputation should be supposed to rest upon this over-rated book. I admit that it contains a few good phrases, but as a story it is simply silly and inane. When I turn over its leaves to refresh my memory I am reminded irresistibly that, even to an indulgent friend in the flesh, he seemed to "write like an angel and talk like poor Poll." Some of Goldsmith's talk, one would suppose, got into the Vicar of Wakefield. Its fatuous tediousness makes one impatient, and one falls to wondering how such a man could write such trash. Were we not, in literature as in all things else, the slaves of shibboleth, we should long ago have rated the book at its true value. We have, perhaps, been blinded to some extent by the personality of Goldsmith, so engaging and helpless, so full of sweet and manly childishness. It is the childishness, I fear, that is in the Vicar.

Let me wind up with a mere impostor. Neither the rampageous Doctor nor the gentle "Goldy" was an impostor; and they will both live as long as literature, although not on the strength of their prose fiction, I should hope. But what of Sainte-Beuve? Was there ever a reputation so little deserved? I declare that there is not a page in the Causeries du Lundi which might not have been written by any journalist of average accomplishment. We are always deploring that the "gay science" of criticism has fallen upon evil days; but there are a dozen papers published in London which print every week criticism quite as keen, as luminous, as original, and as brilliantly expressed as anything that Sainte-Beuve ever wrote. It may be, perhaps, another case of "all can raise the flower now, for all have got the seed"; and my appreciation of Sainte-Beuve may fail for the same reason that Sketches by Boz strikes me as cheap and journalistic. But if that be so, if we really have bettered the teaching of our masters, why not realise the truth, and cease to bestow extravagant praise upon work which is no better than many living men are doing simply because John Doe was the first to do it? Render unto Doe the things that are his due; but let us recognise that, although we reverence him as a devancier, his place is a museum, and not the living stage of literature.

J. P. B.

[Yet Rasselas still has friends. While the bold J. P. B. was inditing his letter, another correspondent, J. J. P., was composing the little note that follows, which reached us by the same post.]

"As to 'anyone reading Rasselas to-day,' may I answer—'I do'? I am re-reading it slowly this very day, so as not to get through it too soon. Yes, and with a mingled keen and restful enjoyment; not as a hill-top, or an hysterical screecher, nor even, perhaps, as much of a tale, and yet as one of the most beautiful works of fiction and most perfect pieces of gracious and stately wisdom in existence. No doubt many another 'one' will say the same, and greatly rejoice in the white vellum with sage-green ribbons. And let those who haven't, forthwith begin."

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE "Duke Algernon" of Northumberland died a devout Irvingite, and his faith is shared by Duke Henry, who, at the mature age of fifty-five, succeeds him. At Alnwick the Duke had his private chapel, and many Londoners must be aware of the beautiful Catholic Apostolic Church more within their reach at Albury, the duke's Surrey home. In his appointments to the livings in his gift, the Duke was able to give scope to many of his most cherished convictions; for you can be very much enamoured of Irvingism, and yet remain in communion with the Church of England. So far as Irvingism was a mere reaction against the barer forms of Protestantism, it has, perhaps, lost one of its mainsprings. Born in the bosom of Presbyterianism, before the days of "the Catholic revival" even in Anglicanism, it was at that time an amazing apparition, not to Irving's friend, Carlyle, only, but even to orthodox Church-of-England men. Many things have happened since then, and Anglican churches in great number rival in ritual and in symbolism the beautiful church in Gordon-square, which is not easily distinguished from a Roman Catholic sanctuary.

ONCE upon a time, in the early seventies, when the present Duke was a young man, he himself was hardly able to distinguish between Gordon-square and Farm-street; and a long voyage was prescribed as the cure—an effectual one it seems—against the mental travels towards Rome. The new Earl Percy, too, is a great wanderer away from his South Kensington seat in Parliament. He, too, is of the Irvingites immovably: though one of his greatest friends and his fellow-traveller in the East, Lord Encombe, has recently joined the Roman Church. Little is heard now of "the gift of tongues" or of those other mystical manifestations which seem to link together in some ways the temperaments of Savonarola and Edward Irving; but deep, abiding, and controlling has been the influence of the humbly-born Scottish preacher on the lives, first of a rich banker, Henry Drummond, then on his daughter, and through her on her husband, the Duke who has just been gathered to his fathers in Westminster Abbey, on her son, the Duke who now reigns, and on the Duke to be. This sort of uplifting unworldliness has many illustrations in modern life. They are not proclaimed and canvassed as are the failures and deteriorations and falls. And that is as it should be. For it proves that man's natural and normal condition is goodness, and that the departure from it is the "news" that is to be noised abroad.

THE new judge, Sir T. T. Bucknill, had a tumble the other day in the hunting-field; and there is a general feeling in the profession that the horse he rode committed a gross contempt by anticipating the Court of Appeal in reversing him.

MR. LECKY, who is as personal as you like on some occasions, devotes several paragraphs of history to the eye of Mr. Gladstone. The eye—or the eyelid either—is a dangerous thing to write about. You are sure to be wrong if you do, as when Procter calls Coleridge's eyes grey and Carlyle calls them brown, or when Rossetti's eyes are described in a catalogue of colours by his different friends, or when Matthew Arnold says, Charlotte Brontë's eyes were grey, though she herself calls them green, and Mrs. Gaskell pronounces them to be a reddish hazel. Not all his contemporaries, then, will agree with Mr. Lecky that Gladstone had "a bird-of-prey eye, fierce, luminous, and restless." Bacon's eye, Aubrey tells us, was like a viper's, and some have said the same of Gladstone's. Others talk of the wolf, and yet others of the lamb. Amid so many contradictory impressions, one need not hesitate to add one's own. In talking of anything that excited him, and particularly in any allusions to the great misfortunes—or, most of all, the madness—of others, Gladstone did, undoubtedly, show a wild eye. It was the eye of the bird of prey, perhaps; but the bird of prey was the eagle, who soars as well as devours. To walk past the cages of the eagles at the Zoo is to recall Gladstone's eye over and over again. But you recall it also, and equally, in the eyes of a row of adoring saints in one of the masterpieces of the Venetian school in the National Gallery.

PEOPLE in New York are said to have been surprised the other night by the number of persons who came in motor-cars to a great entertainment. But the New Yorker is nothing if not practical, and he has discovered that the motor-car has a real mission to replace horses that may be kept waiting for hours in the streets in inclement weather.

So many uncandid things are said and done that some men are perforce cynical without cause. That is why some mystery has been imagined to lurk behind the suicide of Count F. Karolyi, and "the usual verdict" of temporary insanity has been received in some quarters with a tongue in the cheek. But ill-health and the depression following on influenza were, in fact, the only motives to which his death, at the age of twenty-five, was assigned, not only by the jury, but by his intimate friends. This is so much the case that the Roman Catholic Church, which is known to deprive wilful suicides of "religious burial," sent her emissary in the person of a priest of the Jesuit Church in Farm-street to read the office of the dead over the body of the young diplomat in his rooms in Piccadilly.

THE Empress Frederic, in common with most people who have suffered great losses, has a horror of partings; and in saying good-bye to the Queen this week, after her long visit to England, her feelings can easily be divined. Nor is the separation a less mournful one to the Queen. There are always in large families one or two children with whom parents deal almost on the equality of contemporaries. Among the Queen's sons, it was the Duke of Albany in whom she found what might almost be called a confidant. The loss his death was to her has never been made good; none of her other sons has taken his place, and her meetings with them are few and far between. Among her daughters, the Empress Frederic, especially in the last decade, has been on particularly confidential terms of friendship with her mother, as confidential, for instance, as those existing between her Majesty and the Empress Eugénie; and the long stay made in England by her eldest daughter has now so accustomed the Queen to her society that she is not likely to remain long an absentee. Whenever she returns, England will welcome her "Princess Royal" back again.

LADY BUTLER, who gives up Dover Castle almost immediately to Major-General Rundle, will stay in town until she sails to Capetown on the Carisbrook Castle. Mme. Albani will also be on board.

LADY HERMIONE BLACKWOOD, who is about to enter a London hospital as a nurse, is the inheritor of some of the beauty for which her grandmother and her great-aunts were famous. For some time her family opposed her wish to go into the wards; and they finally consented only on the condition that the hospital should be a children's one.

Casualty.

THE shops exhibited luxuries from all the ends of the earth, and, in the fine frosty afternoon, hundreds of people who had more than they needed, walked or drove up and down the busy and fashionable street in search of something, anything, which they did not already possess. It was a beautiful sight for the sandwich men.

The entrance to the picture-gallery was full of footmen waiting for their masters to leave the private view; new carriages continually arrived before the portico, and a constant procession across the pavement of exquisitely-attired women and attentive men interfered seriously with the foot traffic. A little higher up the street was a crowd bending over a particular part of the gutter. I edged my way in, and saw, amid the forest of legs, a considerable pool of blood. No one spoke; we merely stared at the blood, stared and stared: that contented us.

I turned back to the gallery entrance, for I also was going to the private view. A young woman came forth, tall, imperious, young, beautiful. She was dressed in fawn cloth, with opulent furs, and a violet toque; her muff hung at her waist from a thin gold chain. She glanced round in search of her footman and her carriage. Immediately a carriage swept rather loosely to the edge of the pavement. The footman was driving; there was no one else on the box; and the horses were excited.

The footman flushed as the woman approached him. He bent down to her, one eye on the animals and the other timidly upon her.

"Where is Jepson?" she asked, with cold annoyance.

"If you please, m'lady, there's been an accident! Just after you went into the gallery the horses swerved—they were frightened at a 'bus horse which had fell down—and Jepson was thrown off on to the pavement, on his head, m'lady, very peculiar——"

"Where is Jepson?"

"Police took him to the hospital, m'lady."

"What hospital?"

"I don't know, m'lady."

The woman bit her lip.

"Is he dead?"

"No, m'lady; but he's lost a sight of blood."

With a movement of the elbow, almost imperceptible, the footman indicated the pool of blood.

The woman looked, and looked back. She was absolutely calm.

"Can I trust you to manage the horses?"

"Yes, m'lady."

"You're sure?"

"Yes, m'lady."

"Home, then."

She entered the carriage. The footman seemed relieved. Gathering the reins up tight, he clicked to Jepson's horses and drove away, trying not to look self-conscious, and failing in the attempt.

The Mail Train.

DARKNESS had slowly come over the earth; the stars twinkled more brightly overhead. It was very still and quiet as I came down the hillside to the plain. The path led me to a level crossing; I leaned on the gate and watched the unerring metal lines. Their strong soul subdued me strangely. Along the lonely miles, by the unbroken contact of metallic substance, was carried to them the knowledge of a moving line of carriages. Their easy ability calmly awaited the carrying out of their duty to the distant but approaching ponderous mass. And I—poor mortal—but faintly understood their expectant thrill.

Far away in the gloom of the night a whistle screamed, and the sound came to me gently, telling of the approaching train. A few seconds of impatient delay, a beaded line of lights trailing across the plain, and then the stern, red eye appeared at the head of the track and bore down on us swiftly. A second more, the rails clinched and lay there bravely as the pulsating mass of living iron shook past me with its thunder and fire. The lesser things making up the train followed unquestioningly, the tame lights within them flitting by rapidly, showing for an instant travellers within, unconscious of any watching eye. On, round the curve, the carriages rolled with mesmerism obedience in the track of their hoarse conqueror. The receding end showed a quiet green lamp leaning low in grateful thanks to the faithful metal rails. An absurd enthusiasm swept over me. I sprang on to the gate and bared my head. A tremor passed through my frame.

"Her Majesty's Mail," I shouted in a ringing voice. The hill in the darkness behind sent back a faint echo: "Her Majesty's Mail."

Bilked.

A THUMP, a prolonged creaking, and the two vehicles were securely locked—a hansom and a flaming post-office van; and the drivers were at once engaged in controversy. The crowd settled itself in the seat of judgment, as is its wont. I stood upon the pavement of Charing Cross-road and casually watched. Then from the held-up hansom clambered the minute figure of a grizzled woman, and in a nimble moment was close to me upon the side-walk. There she stood and watched the altercation. The hansom was presently disengaged, and the driver, still hurling hard words over his shoulder, suddenly whipped up his horse. In a moment he had resumed his place in the line of northward traffic, and a dozen wheeled things divided him from his trembling fare. Once she whispered "Hi!" and then she became resigned. I attempted to reinforce her timid hail, but it was a time of catarrh with me. Meanwhile No. 37,564 was—with a portmanteau, a box, and an umbrella—hastening earnestly towards Highgate.

Drama.

A Cold Hash of Robertson.

VICTOR HUGO once said: "Il ne faut pas revoir les femmes qu'on a aimées dans sa jeunesse; elles sont bien laides, bien edentées, bien ridicules." With equal point one may say the same of plays. In both cases there are exceptions, but they are rare. Of the Robertson group of plays, epoch-making in their day, only "Caste" retains any genuine vitality. That may live as long as Bulwer Lytton's "Money." But "School" is one of those destined to be laid on that upper shelf where the dust is never disturbed. Mr. John Hare has revived it at the Globe; but it is hardly a revival—it is rather a galvanisation of the old comedy into life. Perhaps it would have been better for Robertson's reputation had this minor work of his been allowed to rest in oblivion or to survive only in the memory of sentimental playgoers who assisted at the Comedy Renaissance effected by the Bancrofts in the old Prince of Wales's Theatre thirty years ago. That "School" is a minor work of its author's may be disputed, by virtue of the cogent test of the box-office returns. We have Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft's word for it in their Reminiscences that it drew more money in its own day than "Caste." But for that there were special reasons. The enterprise of the Bancrofts was growing in popularity; and in Naomi Tighe, the pert and frolicsome schoolgirl, Lady—then Mrs.—Bancroft found a part after her own heart. My theatrical recollections do not go as far back as the production of "School," but by all accounts Naomi Tighe was the idol of the town, and, knowing Mrs. Bancroft's arch and fascinating manner, one can readily picture what her performance must have been. As for the merits of the play itself, it is certainly difficult for the younger generation who visit the Globe to realise that they are in presence of a reputed masterpiece. They sat through the first night stolidly and blankly wondering where the wit and the sparkle, the graphic characterisation, above all, the wonderful naturalism of Robertson were coming in; and I fancy the veterans, the old brigade, laudatores temporis acti, were in pretty much the same case. They were like the German baker described by Hawthorne, who found in England a very respectable Fatherland, but who for thirty years cherished the memory of his beloved Saxony as a still more desirable home, until in an evil moment he returned there and was disillusioned. Sentiment counts for much in the reverence which has hedged in the Robertsonian tradition, and a revival like that of Saturday night blows sentiment to the winds. If you have an ideal, it is better not to bring it down into the market-place for the thoughtless crowd to scoff at.

Besides the Naomi Tighe of Mrs. Bancroft, one of the popular features of "School" was the Beau Farintosh of Mr. John Hare, then as now, professedly speaking, an "old man." As there is no other member of the original cast to take a part with him, it is probably for the sake of his Beau Farintosh that Mr. Hare undertakes this revival. Alas! time has been no kinder to Beau Farintosh than to the piece generally. Not that Mr. Hare does not play it with all his old skill; he probably does. But this elderly buck, dyed and painted, is no living, breathing personage at all; he is a hideous scarecrow—a thing of shreds and patches, a simulacrum which the actor shakes to look like life. One cannot for a moment believe in the reality of Beau Farintosh. Mr. Hare has within our own time given us much better work than this—in "A Pair of Spectacles," for instance, which will go down in the annals without one-twentieth part of the lustre of "School," though both are adaptations. Where, then, are we to look for the wonderful naturalness of "School," which it is said helped so materially to break down the inflated methods of an earlier day? I confess I see it nowhere except in the love scene in the moonlight, where Lord Beaufoy and Bella do their flirting over the milk jug. A pretty sentiment pervades this episode; but the milk jug is not new, it played a part in "Caste," where also, it will be remembered, the stiff and severely aristocratic Captain Hawtree boils the kettle for tea, and such devices easily lose their freshness. In the general scheme of the play convention is pushed to the extreme. The serious pair of lovers is balanced by a comic pair; and in the end not only is the poor governess-pupil, the school drudge, married to a noble lord, but she proves to be the long-lost child of Beau Farintosh himself, who, in the last act, is stripped of his cosmetics, in order to be able to give her a paternal blessing. In fact, "School" is avowedly founded upon the fairy tale of "Cinderella" (through the German), and from the eagerness with which snatches of that tale are listened to, one gathers that the big girls at Dr. and Mrs. Sutcliffe's academy are making their acquaintance with the classic fable for the first time. Mr. Frank Gillmore and Miss Mabel Terry-Lewis—a young actress of rare promise—play the serious lovers very prettily; they do much, indeed, to redeem the artificiality of the piece. It is less easy to accept the Naomi Tighe of Miss Harvey, and the Jack Pointz of Mr. F. Kerr; Miss Harvey is alert and vivacious, but she does not look the schoolgirl well; while her lover, in Mr. Kerr's hands, degenerates into a modern "bounder," ill-mannered to the point of vulgarity, though manifestly intended to be a gentleman—"one the Pointz's of —shire." Perhaps "School" suffers a little from its modern acting. It enjoyed an ideal cast in the old days, and its champions say it is essentially an actors' play. As a relic, it is worth seeing.

Mr. W. S. Penley, the creator of "Charley's Aunt," reappears at length in a new farce at the Royalty, playing the part of a quaint and eccentric nobleman who, returning to his ancestral estate after thirty years' absence (are there such noblemen?), is mistaken by his own relatives for half-a-dozen different people in turn. The piece will not advance Mr. Penley's reputation, but it may help to prevent his being forgotten.

Rejected Addresses.

SIR,—I had sent in the course of six recent months no fewer than seven contributions to a well-known weekly paper, all dated from my home at Nunhead. None were accepted, although they seem to me to have conformed to every requirement. A few weeks ago I removed to one of the Inns. Oddly enough, all my articles dated thence are being accepted readily. This has led me to wonder whether it may not be a piece of wisdom in suburban writers to use a central address, thus converting their Tooting or Harringay geese into Gray's-inn or Adelphi Chambers' swans.—I am, &c.,

"Hubert Ellis" and "F. Davenant."

SIR,—Happening to have a number of volumes of Beeton's Boy's Own Annuals, I looked up Hubert Ellis, which begins the volume for 1865. In the last paragraph of the introduction the author says of the wording of the second part of the title:

It may be as well to state that the editor has authority for wording it as he has done, in the title of one of Wiclif's books, written about the date at which this story begins. The book is called "Wyckliffe's Wycket, whyche he made in Kyng Ricard's days the second. A verye brefe diffinition of the wordes 'Hoc est corpus meum.'"

In the volume for 1868 appear two plates of contributors' portraits, accompanied by short notices. Francis Davenant appears on Plate 1, and the notice runs as follows:

FRANCIS DAVENANT (a nom-de-plume) is a barrister who may one of these days sit on the wool-sack and feed on seals. A shrewd, clever lawyer, but not to be tied down with red tape to nisi prius precedents. He has a facile pen, and can conjure up the heroes of Old England with extraordinary power—witness his stories from history in the Boy's Own Magazine. . . . A series of papers on the Bench and Bar, from the pen of F. Davenant, have appeared in London Society.

If you desire to see the portrait, I will send you the volume containing it with pleasure.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 14.

SOME very interesting answers have been received in response to last week's question, for the suggestion of which we are indebted to "M. C. E." Four words were perhaps too many to ask. Several persons give one excellent neologism and three indifferent ones. A few give two good examples. No one has sent in an ideal list of four words, but Mrs. H. M. Bayne, Holy Trinity Vicarage, Blackheath Hill, S.E., mentions three words that seem to us worthy enough to entitle her to the prize. We have therefore sent her a cheque for a guinea. This is Mrs. Bayne's list:

Roofer: A letter written after staying with a friend, to express your gratitude for the time spent under his hospitable roof.

Crotion: An occurrence which enables you to "crow" over another person. It is the noun corresponding to Mr. Kipling's interjections, "Gloats, gloats and fids!"

Bluedomer: One who declines to go to church, because, he says, he worships God more easily "under the blue dome" of heaven.

Balmynus: Originally "baby" for Parmesan biscuits; and hence, any treasure trove between meals.

"Roofer" and "Bluedomer" are two words that are really needed, and "Crotion" is also happy. One of the happiest words yielded by the competition is Penandinecompoop—A stupid writer—sent by A. T. de M. Some competitors went astray by including words which have passed into current use, whereas we particularly desired original and private terms. We find squish, piffle and piffing, churchiosity, guffin, disremember, and boresome—to name no others. Most people know these, and hence they do not really count.

A selection of good words follows:

Taffy-spanker: The type of English squire who wears a Newmarket coat with large buttons and cuts a figure at Goodwood.

[A. N., London.]

Massies: Opposed to classics.

[E. C., Hull.]

Archæolibird: A term applied to an archaeologist who looks the part.

[J. R. M. M., Glasgow.]

Flapulent: One's adipose annt's method of sitting or reclining.

[W. F. W., London.]

Glug: A greasy mud peculiar to the streets of large cities.

[A. L. S., Kensington.]

Snumble: Expressive of the sensation produced on the nose by drinking effervescent liquors. "It makes me snumble," said a little boy, as he drank some sparkling lemonade.

[E. L., Highgate.]

Whifflement: Object of small importance.

[M. Z. H., Chelsea.]

Quinnydingles: Irrelevancies and trivialities.

[F. E. A., Manchester.]

Sinequonymous: Most essential. (L. Sine quâ non, an indispensable condition.)

[A. T. de M., London.]

Twink: A testy person full of kinks and cranks.

Conflumption: Muddle, catastrophe.

[J. G., Kensington.]

Tilge [Portmanteau Word = Tea Bilge]: Decoction of tea which has stood too long, whether warm or cold.

Screel, verb intr.: To feel the sensation produced by hearing a knife-edge squeal on a plate.

[T. B. D., Bridgwater.]

Incompoop: The Income Tax assessor.

[W. A. L., Highgate.]

Smarmy: Saying treacly things which do not sound genuine.

Serungle: The feeling of hearing a slate pencil squeaked on a slate.

[B. R. L., Brighton.]

Gluzzy: An adjective denoting the quality that is not quite oily, or creamy, or glutinous, but something of each.

[L. E., Budleigh Salterton.]

Puffuboo: A train.

Pantuboo: A steamer.

[W. P., Chelmsford.]

The Athenæum says:—"Beautifully got-up and illustrated.....Among the special merits is a remarkably fine study of the character of Sir George Grey."

Literature says:—"New Zealand at last possesses a history that is not a dry chronicle of events, but is a vivid, brilliant representation of the actual life of the colony, by one who in the past has played, and we hope in the future has still to play, no inconsiderable part in its history."

The Daily News says:—"In all the very considerable literature dealing with these wild and magnificent islands in the South Pacific, we know no single volume which is so eminently readable or so likely to be useful in creating an interest in them."

The Daily Chronicle says:—"In 'The Long White Cloud' he has given us what is out and away the best book on New Zealand.....His work must rank as the most graphic description of the varied and magnificent scenery of New Zealand."

Competition No 15.

SOME years ago Mr. Birrell presented five pounds' worth of books to the Cowdenheath Institute. From his list of about forty the Westminster Gazette extracts the following twenty-eight works, remarking that they form a set which it would be hard to beat:—Politics: Burke's Selected Works, Bright's Speeches, Bagehot's The English Constitution. Biography and History: Lockhart's Lives of Scott and Burns, Boswell's Johnson, Carlyle's Oliver Cromwell, French Revolution, Past and Present, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, and Macaulay's History. Poetry: Shakespeare, Milton, Burns, Scott, Wordsworth (Mr. Morley's edition), and The Golden Treasury of Song. Fiction: Six of Scott's novels; Don Quixote, The Pilgrim's Progress. Miscellaneous: Essays of Elia, Selections from William Hazlitt, and Hugh Miller's My Schools and Schoolmasters. We ask now for another "best" list of twenty-eight books, supplementary to Mr. Birrell's, for a small public institute. The selection must be made on similar lines—that is to say, it must follow the above divisions, Politics, Biography, and so on, but not necessarily in exactly the same proportions. To the competitor who supplies the best list a cheque for one guinea will be sent.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, January 17. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 76.

* * * Owing to the exceptional pressure on our space, the "Academy" Bureau is held over.

SIR JAMES RAMSAY'S NEW WORK.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF ENGLAND :
TWELVE CENTURIES OF BRITISH HISTORY (B.C. 55—A.D. 1154).

By Sir JAMES H. RAMSAY, of Bamff, Bart., M.A.

2 vols., Maps and Illustrations, large 8vo, 21s.

"Almost overwhelmed as we have been of late with English histories, one cannot deny that there was room for a work of this character—indeed, that it was really needed. It is no less welcome than convenient to find the history of these twelve centuries recorded on a uniform scale in the compass of a thousand pages by a writer who has striven to master all our latest knowledge, and to incorporate with due acknowledgment the results of historical research."

Athenæum.

"It is very likely indeed to become an indispensable text-book for the next generation of historical students. For the serious students of British history to-day, this work will serve to mark the extent of the new knowledge which has been won for them by the historical workers of the last thirty years. 'The Foundations of England' is, in fact, a masterly précis of all the most valuable results which the careful analysis of original sources by the many historic workers of the last thirty years has revealed, and that not in the form of a mere catalogue raisonné, but of a narrative at once continuous, uniform, and consistent."—Literature.

"This fine and magisterial work ... broad in view, interesting in personal, and encyclopædic in information."—Notes and Queries.

"A masterpiece of learned research, and a monument of untiring labour.
The book stands by itself, and supplies, in one clear, connected, verified, and authoritative record, the knowledge for which the student without it must ransack a whole library of histories, studies, researches, and works of specialists.
The book compels admiration as history pure and simple. A work of incomparable value."—Scotsman.

SECOND IMPRESSION of ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE'S NEW BOOK.

THE WONDERFUL CENTURY: its Successes and its Failures. Pp. 410, 7s. 6d.

"A very charming account of the great leading discoveries of the century."—Times. "We have seldom read a more compendious and luminous account of the great scientific discoveries which entitle this century to be called 'wonderful.'"—Westminster Gazette. "The book, not of the hour, but of the whole year."—London Review.

A REALLY POPULAR SCHOLARLY LIFE.

LIFE of MARIE ANTOINETTE. By Clara

TSCHUDI. 7s. 8d.

"Written in such a bright and natural manner that it must be carefully kept from High-School girls until the Christmas holidays. Essentially a book to give to a cultured woman as a birthday present."—Speaker. "There are dramatic force and insight in every paragraph, and an unerring perception of the interesting. Absolutely impartial. For dramatic intelligently, combined with judicial fairness and keen-sighted sympathy, it would be hard to beat this biography."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A HISTORY of SWITZERLAND. By Prof. E

DAENDLIKER. Translated by E. SALISBURY. With 2 Coloured

"A book showing a mastery of graphic description."
Daily Telegraph.

What the Critics say
"TALES OF UNREST."

"The name of Mr. Joseph Conrad is new to us, but it appears to us as if he might become the Kipling of the Malay Archipelago."—Spectator.

"Mr. Conrad's characters are almost without exception entirely fresh and unfamiliar, but instinct with vitality."—Athenæum.

"A keen student of the subtleties and wayward contradictions of individual character. Mr. Conrad's command of English is equal to his insight into human nature. His diction is round and picturesque; we can best describe his style by calling it mellow."
Academy.

".....The dreamy pathos of his scenes, his power of revealing natural beauty, and the delicacy of his style, convince me that in him we have a poetic novelist of uncommon promise."—Sketch.

"Glamour! That is Joseph Conrad."—Star.

"We get the impression of tremendous strength.....In many places Mr. Conrad's expression is magnificent."—Black and White.

"The most artistic story is 'The Idiots.' It is terrible in its simple, poignant pathos."
Daily Chronicle.

"Reveal much subtle power of emotional analysis, and great skill in descriptive writing."—Bradford Observer.

"His figures are real flesh and blood drawn to the life."—Daily Telegraph.

"'Karain' is a little masterpiece in its way."—Manchester Guardian.

"At once dreamy and forceful, poetic and picturesque."—Globe.

"A quintet of studies refreshingly original, and highly entertaining."
China Telegraph.

"In 'Karain' and 'An Outpost of Progress' Mr. Conrad shows the hand of a master."

Translated by JOHN TAYLOR, D.Lit., M.A., &c.

"There is no one who with open mind will read the book and not be better for it."—Scotsman.

"Nothing could be more admirable than the arrangement of the Outline."—Leamington Chronicle.

"As to matter, it is the work of a scholar who is not afraid of results suggested by fair research, but who never grasps at novelties merely for the sake of originality. In style and language the book reads more like an original than a translation; an original, too, which in its terseness of expression has escaped the prolix obscurity so commonly complained of in the writings of the author's country."—Church Gazette.

The Literary Week.

WHEN comparatively new books are issued at sixpence it is clear that the revolution in the book trade has begun. Two of the successes of last year are about to be published at that price—Mr. Maurice Hewlett's Forest Lovers and Mr. G. W. Steevens's With Kitchener to Khartum. The publisher who first issues a new book by a popular author at a shilling, or even two shillings, will reap the reward of his enterprise.

A COMPANY has been formed, with a capital of a million sterling, to acquire the publications of Sir William Ingram, including the Illustrated London News, the Sketch, and the Penny Illustrated Paper. Sir William Ingram will be the chairman of the company, but it is not correct that the company will be known by his name. It will be called "The Illustrated London News, Ltd."

THE Edinburgh Review deals in its January number with the first volume of Sir George Otto Trevelyan's American Revolution. This is unusually quick, for the book has been out only a few days. The explanation, of course, is that the history and the review are both published by Messrs. Longmans.

THE Quarterly Review, which some months ago dealt summarily with the principal poets of the day, now examines the claims of the poetesses. The survey begins with Joanna Baillie, of whom good is spoken. Then come Mrs. Hemans, Mrs. Browning, and Charlotte and Emily Brontë. The modern school begins with Christina Rossetti, "greatest of woman poets," and these names follow: Augusta Webster, Harriett Hamilton King, Constance Naden, Adelaide Ann Procter, Mathilde Blind, Jean Ingelow, E. Nesbit, Madame Darmesteter, Mrs. Meynell, and Amy Levy. Each of the foregoing is considered by the Quarterly Reviewer with some degree of attention.

OTHERS are then merely named: Mrs. Norton and Eliza Cook, Letitia Landon and Mrs. Pfeiffer, Katharine Tynan and Mrs. Radford, Lady Wilde and M. B. Smodley, Violet Fane, Graham R. Tomson, Mrs. Piatt, L. N. Little, Mrs. Margaret Woods, and Isa Blagden and Isa Craig-Knox. Having gone so far in enumeration, we wonder why the reviewer ever stopped. There are names here of whom we know nothing; there are names not here—Louisa Shore's, for example—with real claims

LAST week we wrote of the boy-poet. This week comes a girl-poet, who is more advanced than he, in that a volume from her pen is already published: Songs of Greater Britain (Manchester: Sherratt & Hughes). The girl-poet is Miss Cicely Fox Smith. She is a Manchester resident, and her age is sixteen. Her subject is patriotism, and her inspiration is largely Mr. Kipling; but she has little thoughts of her own, and a true ear for music. Here is a specimen:

And now, when battle draweth nigh,
'Neath modern culture's slight veneer,
The Briton feels his heart beat high,
Showing that Viking blood is here.

And another:

The sweep of English uplands,
The sigh of English trees,
The laugh of English rivers,
Or breath of English breeze;
The scent of purple clover
Off English meadows blown —
These, these to me are dearest,
For they are England's own.

Not bad for sixteen.

MR. LE GALLIENNE's story, The Quest of the Golden Girl, has been adapted by its author for the stage. It will be produced shortly with a musical accompaniment, after the manner of plays with the word "girl" in the title.

ANOTHER American change of title. Mr. Canton's Child's Book of Saints—which, unhappily, must have frightened as many purchasers as it attracted—was called by its ingenious American publisher W. F.'s Golden Legend.

A CIRCULAR issued by Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Co., of New York, states that the American Bookman has now a circulation of 13,500.

MORE than one correspondent misread our original undertaking, made in November last, with regard to the mention of Omar Khayyám. Our actual promise was to abstain from reference to him for a month: as a matter of fact, six weeks elapsed before his name appeared again in these columns. Yet Mr. Arthur Bryant writes:

You threatened to ignore that fragrant name,
The Lover of the Rose and gracious Vine;
He, pitying, smiles and will not stoop to blame:
Look, Sir, and blush, upon page 39.

MR. THOMAS NELSON PAGE, the author of Red Rock, a novel which America is now reading avidly, and which Mr. Heinemann has just published here, has put to it a very charming preface on the courtesies and ceremonials that obtained in the South "before the war."

He writes:

MR. THOMAS NELSON PAGE.

Antiquated, you say? Provincial? Do you, young lady, observe Miss Thomasia the next time she enters a room, or addresses a servant; and do you, young sir, polished by travel and contact with the most fashionable — second-class — society of two continents, watch General Legaie and Dr. Cary when they meet Miss Thomasia, or greet the apple-woman on the corner, or the waggoner on the road. What an air suddenly comes in with them of old courts and polished halls, when all gentlemen wore swords to defend their honour, and bowed low before all ladies. What an odour, as it were, of those gardens which Watteau painted, floats in as they enter! Do not you attempt it. You cannot do it. You are thinking of yourself, they of others and the devoirs they owe them. You are republican and brought up to consider yourself "as good as any, and better than most." Sound doctrine for the citizen, no doubt; but it spoils the bow. Even you, Miss or Madam, for all your silks and satins, cannot do it like Miss Thomasia. You are imitating the duchess you saw once, perhaps, in Hyde Park. The duchess would have imitated Miss Thomasia. You are at best an imitation; Miss Thomasia is the reality. Do not laugh at her or call her provincial. She belongs to the realm where sincerity dwells and the heart still rules—the realm of old-time courtesy and high breeding, and you are the real provincial. It is a wide realm, though; and some day, if Heaven be good to you, you may reach it. But it must be by the highway of Sincerity and Truth. No other road leads there.

We reproduce Mr. Page's portrait from the American Bookman.

SOME interesting notes on words were made by Dr. Murray in his remarks on his great New English Dictionary at the meeting of the Philological Society last week. The work, by the way, has now reached "Hod." The section Hy, it seems, was lost for some time and then found intact, but the MS. for Pa and Pe, after being missing for twelve years, came to light, in a seriously depleted condition, in a stable in county Cavan. For sustained difficulty no letter in the alphabet equals H. Speaking afterwards of the origins of words, Dr. Murray said that, although "hunchback" was found in the second quarto of Richard III., no use of the word "hunch" alone can be found by any of his assistants earlier than 1804. Prof. Skeat, who spoke afterwards, made a statement which will not, we trust, be resented by those who attempted last week's Prize Competition. "Bishop Codrington," he said,

"had told of certain savages who amused themselves on occasions by deliberately attempting to coin words, which were accepted or rejected by their fellows."

ANOTHER new word. A correspondent who has been reprimanded for using the word "replaced" when the context demanded the word "supplanted," suggests "supplaced" as a compromise.

NEW words have been exercising other people beside the members of the Philological Society. The ladies and gentlemen at Barnum's, whom it has been customary to describe as freaks, met together on Sunday to decide upon a less objectionable term. After much consideration of proposals from all parts of the country, they settled upon "Prodigies"—the suggestion of Canon Wilberforce and the Bearded Lady. Some of the rejected words were: Ambiguities, Abnormals, Anomalies, Caprices, Differentials, Dilemmas, Deviations, Erratics, Nature's Exceptions, Fantasts, Inexplicables, Naturals, Oddities, Originalities, Pranks, Problematics, Randoms, Sports, Human Specialities, Uniques, Unusuals, Uncertainties, Variants, Vagaries, Wonders, Whims, God's Curios, and Human Marvels.

APROPPOS of Human Marvels, it is told, we believe in Edmund Yates's Recollections, that Mr. Herman Merivale, the dramatist, once found himself mentioned in a Swiss Visitors' List as "Human Marvel and family."

THE danger of making jokes is no less pressing to-day than it was ages ago. One is still wise in erecting a number of sign-posts. We are incited to this reflection by the circumstance that the New York Critic takes a recent parody of Mr. Bernard Shaw in this paper to be a genuine utterance. The parody was part of a series called "Mary Had a Little Lamb," and some pains were taken to indicate that it was a parody. Yet the Critic says: "According to Mr. Shaw, 'vegetarianism is the foundation of the finest intellectual dramas.' He accuses Mary, of reverend memory, of having eaten her little lamb, and yet, so far as I know, there is nothing in history to prove this horrible accusation. No lamb enters into the composition of his brain. Each of his plays was the inspiration of a different vegetable. 'I wrote,' he says, 'Mrs. Warren's Profession on lentil soup, You Never Can Tell on beans'"—and so forth. We will be more careful next time.

WE give this week a portrait of Gyp in her study. Gyp, who is in real life the Comtesse de Martel, has just been ordered to pay 5,000 francs damages for her libel upon M. Trarieux in Le Journal d'un Grinchu. She has given notice of appeal, but we must confess, ungallant though it may sound, that we shall hope to see the judgment upheld, for the libel was a cruel one. Gyp has little need to touch politics; her subjects lie elsewhere, and no one can deal with them more wittily. If this little lesson sickens her of public affairs, we shall all profit.

GYP.

MR. SWINBURNE'S contribution to the Star's Birthday Number—a most interesting compilation—took the form of a prologue to Cyril Tournear's "Revenger's Tragedy." The Chronicle, in commenting thereon, made an amusing mistake. It conceived "The Revenger's Tragedy" to be a forthcoming work by Mr. Swinburne himself, and remarked that if it kept up to the level of the prologue it would be "a stormy affair indeed." The play, we may inform the Chronicle, is a "stormy affair," and has been so for three hundred years. But perhaps our contemporary's remark was only another "humour test."

FROM the week's prefaces. Mr. George Moore, in his introduction to Mr. Edward Martyn's Heather Field and Maeve:

In Ibsen are combined poet, philosopher, and dramatist in almost the same proportions as in Shakespeare, more than in Racine, Goethe, or Hugo. He is deficient only in the romantic spectacle which Shakespeare provides in abundance. Shakespeare alone amid dramatists was able to remain a poet for his pleasure while conceding booths and roundabouts to his audience for theirs. But the psychological drama does not admit of spectacle; that is why it fails on the stage. The explanation is a sad one, for if it be true we shall never possess a popular literary drama again. The psychological drama is the only possible literary drama in the nineteenth century.

Nine-tenths of an actor's life must be given up to rubbish; rubbish is the fare of the multitude, and it is the multitude that enables the actor to keep the roof over his head; but he should reserve a tenth part of his life for himself—for his art. All actors try to do this, for actors love their art; they talk about it incessantly, and never about their salaries; in this respect their attitude towards their art compares very favourably with that of authors towards theirs.

Mr. Archer's belief was that the goal could be reached by encouraging, with insincere praise, all work that seemed new, every play that seemed better than the last play; his attitude towards dramatic writing has, therefore, been one of benevolent insincerity. He has pursued this policy for twenty years, and he has only to hear the plays now running at the London theatres to be convinced that he has not "educated" the public taste.

The divorce court has always been accepted by Mr. Archer as the symbol of thoughtfulness.

The little story entitled Ships that Pass in the Night is not lofty in conception, not very profound, but it is wistful and true, and it therefore holds its own by the side of Don Quixote, On the Eve, and L'Education Sentimentale.

Incidentally we may remark that Mr. Martyn dedicates "these two plays to George Moore, W. B. Yeats, and Arthur Symonds." Problem: how will they divide the spoil?

FROM the week's dedications. The Tale of Archais, by "A Gentleman of the University of Cambridge":

TO
THE WHITE MAIDS OF ENGLAND
THIS TALE OF GREECE IS

Sonnets, by C. T. M.:

DEDICATED
WITHOUT A HEART.

The first sonnet begins:

The swell of love doth force this song from me
As mountain billows force asunder land.

A sonnet is not a song; but no matter.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times writes to explain away Mr. Lecky's disparaging description of some of Mr. Gladstone's facial expressions, to which reference was made in the ACADEMY last week. The writer, "D. S.," says:

I was reminded of a very interesting talk I had with Mr. Gladstone on this very subject—his expression. I asked him, rather like Red Riding Hood: "Mr. Gladstone, why do you sometimes look so fierce?"

"I know what you refer to," he replied, "but you should remember that look of fierceness, as you call it, is greatly the result of age; the muscles of the face used to express deep attention and concentration of thought are the same muscles used to express the passion of anger. As one grows older the muscles of concentrated attention are more often called into play, owing to the difficulty of hearing, and the look you speak of becomes intensified.

"I am quite conscious that in repose as well as in conversation I wear sometimes this fierce look; but, I repeat, it is only the knit brow of attention stamped on an old face."

Subsequently "D. S." asked Mr. Gladstone: "When young were you handsome?" "He turned to me, a face illuminated by that wonderful smile of his, and said, with a kind of parental fondness for his past self, 'Well, I don't think I was exactly handsome, but I had beautiful eyes.'"

TOWN COUNCILLORS as critics of poetry are blunt and sweeping. The Daily News, which is just now collecting comic stories of mayors, tells of a Town Council which, sitting in committee as the Burial Board to improve proposed inscriptions on grave-stones, considered the application of the friends of a deceased person to have four lines from Tennyson inscribed on the stone. The clerk duly read the following from "Crossing the Bar":

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me?
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea.

A Councillor said: "I object. That's what I call doggerly"; and the Council ruled it out.

WITH reference to the attack on Rasselas which was made by "J. P. B." in the ACADEMY last week, a correspondent reminds us of the lamented quarrel between Miss Deborah Jenkyns and Captain Brown on the same subject, in Cranford. Captain Brown was a champion of Boz, Miss Jenkyns of Johnson. Captain Brown, it will be remembered, gave the company the account of the "swarry" which Sam Weller participated in at Bath; Miss Jenkyns "read one of the conversations between Rasselas and Imlac, in a high-pitched majestic voice; and when she had ended, she said: 'I imagine I am now justified in my preference of Dr. Johnson as a writer of fiction.'"

THE first number of Messrs. Macmillan's new magazine, the School World, is a thoroughly workmanlike production. The object of the magazine is to promote the interests of education by publishing information and comments on the principles and practice of teaching in secondary schools. These subjects have received any amount of individual attention, but the need to co-ordinate endeavour, to record results, and to exchange observations have never been fully met: hence the School World. The first number, which lies before us in an attractive apple-green cover, contains some valuable articles.

MR. H. G. WELLS, whose scholastic attainments have been obscured by his success as a novelist, contributes an article entitled "Wanted—A Classification." Therein he throws doubt on the existence of "the average boy." He is sceptical of the value of that classification of boys which fixes on a central type and then judges of each boy by his nearness or remoteness to that centre. It is more probable, Mr. Wells suggests, that there are several types, all populous, and all disinclined to merge into other types; and he believes that in the schools of the future the "classificatory diagnosis" of boys will be improved by the acceptance of this proposition. Among the other contents we notice a paper on the "Physical Observation of Brain Conditions of Boys and Girls in Schools," by Dr. Francis Warner; a paper on "The Early Teaching of French," by Prof. Walter Rippmann; "Bimanual Training in Schools," an illustrated article by Mr. Henry Bloomfield Bare, besides articles more immediately directed to the schoolroom. A good portrait of the Rev. Joseph Wood, the new Head Master of Harrow, is among the illustrations.

THE American poet, Joaquin Miller, who has returned from Klondyke, is about to figure on a music-hall stage. We are not aware of what the nature of his "turn" will be, but it will have reference to Klondyke. After all, why should not a literary man try the halls? Mr. Dan Leno has just produced "Hys Booke."

ACCORDING to the American Bookman, one of Dean Farrar's novels has been dramatised by Mr. Chillingham Hunt, a well-known English elocutionist. The Dean has expressed satisfaction with the play, which is completed, and the next interesting event will be the production.

WE give this week, from the British Museum Autographs, a facsimile of the beginning of Tennyson's draft of the dedication of the epilogue of the Idylls of the King to Her Majesty. The title and ascription were added by the original MS of the Epilogue to the "Idylls of the King":

To the Queen.

O loyal to the royal in thyself,
And loyal to thy land, as this to thee—
Bear witness, that rememberable hour, morn
When pale from fever yet the goodly Prince,
Who scarce had pluck'd his flickering life again
From halfway down the shadow of the grave,
Past with thee thro' thy people & their love,
And London roll'd one ^{tide} voice of joy thro' all
Her tebbled millions, & loud leagues of man
And welcome:

BEGINNING OF THE EPILOGUE TO THE "IDYLLS OF THE KING."

present Lord Tennyson, who presented the MS. to the British Museum last year. The date of the epilogue was 1872.

MR. BIRRELL'S oration on "The Ideal University," delivered at University College last summer, has now been printed and issued by the University College Union Society. We extract some points:

Though Shakespeare was not a Professor he occasionally said a thing worth repeating.

An ideal Patron is perhaps a contradiction in terms.

I shall never forget the surprise with which my father, who was an old pupil of Chalmers, entered a room in Cambridge, where a Professor of Divinity was lecturing a handful of candidates for Anglican Orders. It certainly was not an animating picture. It did not remind one of Abelard. There was no crowd, no feeling, and yet the lecturer was Lightfoot. I remember telling my father if he really wanted to see high pressure at Cambridge he must seek admission into the parlour in the private house in which the famous Routh was then rattling his pupils, a small transfigured band of future wranglers, along the paths of glory.

In looking back upon my own life at Cambridge, I remember with peculiar pleasure how on two or three occasions (unfortunately they were no more) Prof. Seeley did me the kindness of correcting in my presence effusions which I had written for his class. I was abashed, but it is when you are abashed that you learn. It was the only teaching of the kind I got at Cambridge.

There was a private coach I used to hear of when I was at Cambridge who was prepared to teach anybody anything. This honest man bargained but for one thing in addition to his exceedingly moderate terminal charges:

"You must give me," so he would engagingly say, "five minutes start."

The functions of the coach and the University are not the same.

Sir Blundell Maple, who is (as you all know) our Professor of Philanthropy, is the only one of my colleagues who is unpaid, and teaches by example.

If ever there was a theatre for academical actors, it is London. If ever there was a people and an age that needed the higher education, we are that people, and we live in that age.

The oration makes good reading, but it seems to have missed the advantage of revision by the author. The punctuation occasionally leaves much to be desired.

MR. BIRRELL—by the way—has just been elected to an honorary fellowship of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He entered the college in 1869, and graduated with honours in the law tripos in 1872.

MR. AUSTIN DOBSON has recently written the following critical quatrain in a copy of the works of Edgar Allan Poe:

I wonder when America will know
That much her greatest bard is Edgar Poe.
I say this reminiscent and defiant
Of Boker, Tabb, and Longfellow, and Bryant.

It is permissible, we hope, to prefer the sentiment to the form. But—poor Boker!

MAJOR RAVERTY has been for some time preparing a new and improved edition of his works—the Grammar, Dictionary, and Selections—in the Afghan language, in view of the order just issued by the Indian Government requiring all officers of native regiments to make themselves proficient in the language chiefly spoken by the men of the corps to which they may be permanently posted.

Bibliographical.

ONE of the most interesting things about the book by Mr. Edward Martyn (The Heather Field) which Messrs. Duckworth publish to-day (Friday) is the fact that Mr. Martyn, on the title-page, avows himself the author of Morgante the Lesser. This announcement, I fear, will not convey much to nine people out of ten, or to ninety people out of a hundred; but it is notable for all that. In 1890 (that, at least, is the date on the title-page) there appeared in London a book called Morgante the Lesser; his Notorious Life and Wonderful Deeds, Arranged and Narrated for the First Time by Sirius. This "Sirius," it would seem, was the writer on whose two plays, The Heather Field and Maave, Mr. George Moore has now penned an éloge. I doubt if Morgante the Lesser had much of a circulation; I doubt, indeed, if it received much notice from the press. In truth, "Sirius" himself declared that he would rather see his work "neglected altogether than approached in a spirit of undue levity." The critics must have decided to neglect it. I do not pretend to have read all of it myself, but such pages as I have dipped into conveyed the flavour of a sort of fantastic and esoteric satire, for which anything like popularity was not to be expected.

In Mr. Edmund Gosse's contribution to the new number of the North-American Review—"The Literature of Action"—there is a little bit of literary history which has not, I think, been in print before. It has reference to Treasure Island, which, as we all know, first appeared in a periodical for boys. Says Mr. Gosse: "It is a curious circumstance (of which I could give documentary proof) that it was found too romantic a tale of action for the boy subscribers to this silly print. If the editor could have broken off his contract, the end of Treasure Island would never have appeared." Of such are the vicissitudes of masterpieces!

Wrote a literary oracle the other day: "The lives of the Keiths—Marischal and his brother James, the friend of Frederick the Great—have yet to be written." The Field Marshal, of course, has been utilised by Mr. Lowe in his tale of A Fallen Star; "but the day of the historian is at hand." Undoubtedly a book on the two Keiths, adequately done, would be very interesting, for they lived lives both romantic and picturesque; they were ideal representatives of the fighting "Scot abroad." Meanwhile, we have long possessed the Autobiography of James Keith, which might with advantage be reprinted. Good use of it was made, a year or two ago, by the author of a little book called Under Many Flags: Stories of Scottish Adventurers, in which the careers of the two Keiths were very agreeably outlined.

Sir Frederick Pollock's Spinoza: his Life and Philosophy, of which we are shortly to have a second and revised edition, came out originally in 1880. Since then we have had the monograph on Spinoza which the late Principal Caird published through Blackwoods in 1888. Translations into English from the philosopher's works have also been pretty numerous during the past two decades. The impulse to the more recent vogue of Spinoza was given, of course, by Matthew Arnold in his first series of Essays in Criticism—an epoch-making book in more than one respect.

Mr. Jerome K. Jerome, who has been living at Dresden for some time, finding, I gather, his chief entertainment at the opera, has been invited to visit Russia, and will probably accept the invitation, going there next month. His Second Thoughts of an Idle Fellow has been published in a Russian translation, and, with certain other of his books, has caused even the stern muscles of Count Tolstoi to relax—a fact to which one of the Count's daughters testifies. Mr. Jerome should give us, by and by, his First Thoughts about Russia and its people.

I see that Dr. R. F. Horton is to discourse of Tennyson in the series of books called Saintly Lives. We all know that the poet was a truly religious man, in the highest sense of the word; but I doubt if he would lie comfortably in his grave if he knew that he was going to be dubbed "saintly," and celebrated accordingly. Perhaps he did pose a little as a latter-day seer or prophet, as, indeed, he was; he would, however, hardly have set up for a "saint"—he had too keen a sense of humour.

The reproduction of our English classics proceeds apace. The latest substantial addition to the list will be Hobbes's Leviathan, which I suppose is ripe for the distinction, seeing that it has not, I believe, been reprinted in its entirety for sixteen or seventeen years. Of Hobbes's Behemoth there was an edition so recently as 1894.

Is it the fact that all Lady Jackson's books dealing with French history are to be re-issued? There are plenty of them. She began, in 1878, with Old Paris: its Court and its Salons; then came, in 1880, The Old Régime: its Court, Salons, and Theatres. But the historical series proper dates from 1881, when Lady Jackson gave us French Court and Society; the Reign of Louis XVI. and the First Empire; after which we had in succession The Court of the Tuileries from the Restoration to the Flight of Louis Philippe (1883), The Court of France in the Sixteenth Century, 1514-1559 (1886), The Last of the Valois (Henry III.) and The Accession of Henry of Navarre, 1559-1589 (1888), and, lastly, The First of the Bourbons (Henry IV.) (1890).

We now have the Poems of George Meredith in two handy (not, I think, very attractive) volumes. But, alas! they are not quite up to date, for they do not include the Odes in Contribution to the Song of French History, just published. Some readers may be glad to have a list of Mr. Meredith's successive publications of verse. Here it is: Poems (1851), Modern Love and Poems of the English Roadside (1862), Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth (1883), Ballads and Poems of Tragic Life (1887), A Reading of Earth (1888), Jump-to-Glory Jane (1892), and Poems: The Empty Purse, with Odes and Verses (1892).

Yet another Life of Lord Clive! This time it takes the form of an addition to the series on "Builders of Great Britain." But surely the thing has been overdone? We already have biographies of Clive from the varied pens of C. Caraccioli, the Rev. G. R. Gleig, Colonel Malleon, Sir J. Malcolm, and Sir C. Wilson—to say nothing, of course, of the famous Macaulay essay. Are these not enough?

The Losing of an Empire.

The American Revolution. Part I., 1766-1776. By the Right Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Bart. (Longmans. 16s.)

For a score of years, while Sir George Trevelyan has been entangled in the meshes of Unionist and Liberal politics, the world has delighted itself with the inimitable picture of a man and of an age which he painted in The Early History of Charles James Fox. That he should some day attempt to trace in a sequel the remainder of the career of that greatest of the Whigs was only to be expected, and in the preface to the present work the obligation is acknowledged. But "the insuperable difficulties in this case of writing a political biography as distinguished from a political history" have led him to modify his original design, and to throw his study of the maturer years of Fox into the shape of a narrative of that momentous event with which the career of his hero is "inextricably interwoven," which in the height of his genius and fame "filled his mind and consumed his activities." Truth to say, the book now presented to us shows in its structure some traces of this change of policy. The first chapter is entirely devoted to Fox, to a survey of his position, —political, ethical, and financial—when, after a meteoric period, during which he figured as a very Alcibiades in the eyes of London, he left office, to all appearance a ruined man at three-and-twenty, in the year 1774. This event, the sorrow which he brought upon his parents, and the death, in the space of a few brief months, of father, mother, and elder brother, worked something of what an extinct school of theology used to call a "conversion" in the character of Charles Fox. Then followed, says his biographer, a "period of eager and anxious repentance"; and the lad, for he was hardly more, turned to remake his life in a new spirit. Henceforward, though the tenor of his ways suffered no immediate and obvious outward change, the inner spring of it became, and remained until his death, a serious and disinterested love of public liberty and public well-being. The change in temper coincided with a change of political associates. He "cut himself adrift from the reckless official crew," the Sandwiches and Rigbies who served as the king's tools in the ministry of dull Lord North, and cast in his lot with the disheartened Whigs, the Rockinghams, and other chieftains of great houses, whose intentions were better than their abilities, and who only wanted a heaven-sent leader to play a patriotic part. This they were to find in Fox, and the battle-ground was to be the American War. The cause was Fox's opportunity, and he seized it.

He came to the great argument fresh and unhampered, his mind and his body full of elasticity and strength. Without misgiving, without flagging, and with small thought of self, he devoted an eloquence already mature, and an intellect daily and visibly ripening, to a cause which, more than anyone else, he contributed to make intelligible, attractive, and at length irresistible. That cause at its commencement found him with a broken career. Its triumph placed him in the position of the first subject, and even (considering that his principal antagonist had been the king himself) of the first man in the country.

So far Sir George Trevelyan takes you in the first chapter, and, doubtless, when his work is complete, Fox will take his proper place as hero and will dominate the story. But it is a little disappointing to find that after this beginning Fox practically passes into insignificance for the rest of the present instalment. There is a passage, indeed, in which he joins Burke in his opposition to the Tea-duty in 1774; a passage describing his assumption of leadership in 1775; and a passage, somewhat prematurely introduced here, which sets in contrast to his adventurous youth the serene domestic felicities of his later days. Otherwise, surely to the reader's regret, he has to stand aside while Sir George Trevelyan gets on the canvas the other actors in the great drama.

Whatever awkwardness and disproportion this change of plan may have produced, it does not take long to assure oneself that Sir George Trevelyan's pen has in no respect lost its cunning. The art of writing history, as it is understood by the "Oxford School" of to-day, is not to write it. There is a reversion to the method of the annalists. You string together elaborately verified "documents" in chronological order, and leave them to tell their own tale, with as little of comment or interpretation as may be. The method has its uses, but it is not Sir George Trevelyan's. Like his illustrious uncle, he writes. His object is less to painfully establish facts—and, indeed, the facts of the American Revolution have long been pretty well established—than to dramatise them, to give life, reality and fresh colours to the men, manners and events of the stirring past. For this achievement his wide reading, his buoyant wit, his grasp of the telling in portraiture, exactly fit him. We had really forgotten, while he has been playing his difficult part on the political stage, what a master of nervous, vigorous, picturesque English he is. Without being open to any charge of flashiness or superficiality, his history reads like a novel. The lengthy analysis of the conditions in England and America under which the struggle broke out, of the two types of civilisation which it brought into conflict, of the individual personalities involved, is as good as it can be. The writer has steeped himself alike in the Puritanism of eighteenth century New England and in the Epicureanism of eighteenth century Old England, and for his knowledge of their qualities and foibles the statesmen and captains of both peoples might have been his colleagues in the cabinet or in the field. The description of the Whig magnates who were Fox's material for his campaign may serve as an inadequate specimen of his easy style.

There were politicians for whom the sweetest hours of the twenty-four began when the rattle of the coaches up St. James's-street told that the House of Commons was no longer sitting, and ended when they were helped into their beds by daylight; in whose eyes Ranelagh surpassed all the gardens of Chatsworth, and the trees in the Mall were more excellent than the elms at Althorp or the oaks of Welbeck. But Rockingham and his followers loved the country; and there were few among them who did not possess plenty of it to love. Assembling for business in a November fog, and wrangling on until a June sun shone reproachfully through the windows, seemed a doubtful form of happiness even to Gibbon, whose conception of rustic solitude did not go beyond a cottage at Hampton Court during the summer months. But to haunt London when the thorns were red and white and the syringas fragrant, or when the hounds were running over the Yorkshire pastures and the woodcocks were gathering in the Norfolk spinneys; to debate amidst clamour, and vote in a lobby where there was hardly space to stand, with the hope that at some unknown point in the future he might draw salary for a few quarter-days—was not a career to the mind of a great landowner who seldom got as much of sport and fresh air as he could wish, and who, since he had outgrown the temptations of the card-table, had never known what it was to spend half his income.

Sir George Trevelyan is, perhaps, at his very best in his appreciations of eighteenth century society on either side of the Atlantic, and of the men who made it. But he is nearly as good when he settles down, as he does in the last hundred pages of the volume, to narrate the actual incidents of the war. The story covers the opening battle of Lexington and the first great reverse of the colonists at Bunker's Hill. It tells of the assumption of the general command by Washington, and closes with the abandonment of Boston by the British and the triumphant occupation of the city by the American army. The reader is, of course, left in no doubt throughout as to the sympathies of the historian. For Sir George Trevelyan is frankly a Whig writing of one of the episodes of history to which Whiggism can look back with most justifiable pride. Fox and Burke and their associates had, indeed, both justice and enlightened patriotism on their side during the whole of the long struggle; and though in the end it was the logic of events, rather than the logic of argument, which triumphed, still their attitude is one of the legitimate boasts of those who inherit their traditions. And, naturally enough, Sir George Trevelyan does not spare the king, to whose stupidity, selfishness, and obstinacy—more than to any other single cause—the loss of England's first colonial empire must be ascribed. The contrast between George the Third and Fox—the one so faulty a man and so enlightened and patriotic a statesman, the other so abounding in the personal virtues, and withal so wretched a ruler—is one in which the student of human nature may find food for reflection. Let us add in conclusion that, though a partisan, Sir George Trevelyan is neither a narrow nor an unjust one. He can appreciate the merits of such an opponent as Lord Dartmouth; and his affection for the Americans does not blind him to the doubtfully justifiable character of the "boycotting" to which the "loyalists" were in some places subjected. But his brilliant and sympathetic vindication of their policy as a whole should come as one of many peace-offerings to the extinction of an ancient feud.

Waving Grass.

WHEN tired thought flags and the life burns low,
And wearier waxes the world of men,
There is virtue of healing where green things grow,
And the quiet of fields is a power, then;
But most—to wander and watch at will
The ripple of grass on a windy hill.

Pre-Raphaelite Gossip.

Ruskin, Rossetti, Pre-Raphaelitism. Papers 1854 to 1862.
Arranged and edited by William Michael Rossetti.
With illustrations. (George Allen. 10s. 6d.)

MR. WILLIAM ROSSETTI begins this book with a defence of his memoir of his brother published in 1895, the frankness of which, he says, found "not a little disfavour with critics in the press." Mr. Rossetti gives undue prominence to a small matter. For ourselves, it has always seemed to us that his methods, not his intentions, were at fault. That nice tact, so indispensable to the memoir-writer, was never his. In the present volume the quantity of editorial matter is very small indeed, but we feel that it might with advantage have been less. Many of the letters and other items are preceded each by its own tiny introduction; in nearly every instance footnotes would have served equally well, and would have been less disturbing and much shorter. We do not like the arrangement of the matter, but, as no arrangement could possibly have been satisfactory, we need not press that point. Mr. Rossetti says the book is "complete in itself." It is not so. As early as p. 4 part of an exceedingly interesting letter of Dante Rossetti's is omitted because it has appeared in the volume of 1895.

Our criticisms are trifling, and we make haste to say that this latest contribution to the history of the Pre-Raphaelite movement is singularly full of interest. It contains little padding; there is scarcely a letter but has a distinct and authentic value. The principal items in it are correspondence between Mr. Ruskin and Dante Rossetti and Miss Siddal ("Ida" was Mr. Ruskin's pet name for her), extracts from the diary of Ford Madox Brown, and certain poems and letters by Miss Siddal.

Although there seems to have been reason for Brown's dislike of the author of Modern Painters, Mr. Ruskin's attitude towards Rossetti, as the leader of the great movement, was one of pure kindness and discretion. He was finely frank about himself in some of his letters to Dante:

You constantly hear a great many people saying I am very bad, and perhaps you have been yourself disposed lately to think me very good. I am neither the one nor the other. I am very self-indulgent, very proud, very obstinate, and very resentful; on the other side I am very upright—nearly as just as I suppose it is possible for man to be in this world—exceedingly fond of making people happy, and devotedly reverent to all true mental or moral power. I never betrayed a trust—never wilfully did an unkind thing—and never, in little or large matters, depreciated another that I might raise myself. . . . Now you know the best and worst of me, and you may rely upon it it is the truth.

The book fully discloses Mr. Ruskin's fondness for "making people happy." He had money and he had critical power, and he used both lavishly to help the men in whom and the movement in which he believed. Early in the fifties he told Rossetti that Rossetti was a very great man, and he never swerved from his absolute faith in Rossetti's art. He was always buying pictures from him and paying for them in advance. Of course we knew this before, but not in detail. We are now shown exactly what the P. R. B. owed to Mr. Ruskin's courageous.

championship of them, to his money, and—not less—to his common sense. He was not afraid to criticise; some of his letters are amusingly pedagogic, considering the reverence in which he held Rossetti:

You must take out the head and put it in as it was at first, or I never could look at it.

Again:

If you like to do another side of the Union [the Oxford frescoes] I will consider that as 70 guineas off my debt: provided there's no absolute nonsense in it, and the trees are like trees, and the stones like stones.

And he writes to Mr. William Rossetti:

You know the fact is they're all the least bit crazy, and it's very difficult to manage them.

Mr. Ruskin's relations with Miss Siddal were touchingly beautiful. He guided her with an exquisite tact, not only in art, but in matters of health; and he was always genuinely anxious to assist her. She showed a natural diffidence in accepting that assistance: this is how he sought to overcome it:

Perhaps I have said too much of my wish to do this for Rossetti's sake. But, if you do not choose to be helped for his sake, consider also that the plain hard fact is that I think you have genius; that I don't think there is much genius in the world; and I want to keep what there is in it, heaven having, I suppose, enough for all its purposes. Utterly irrespective of Rossetti's feelings or my own, I should simply do what I do, if I could, as I should try to save a beautiful tree from being cut down, or a bit of a Gothic cathedral whose strength was failing. If you would be so good as to consider yourself as a piece of wood or Gothic for a few months, I should be grateful to you. . . .

And then the charming postscript:

If you would send me a little signed promise—"I will be good"—by Rossetti . . .

Miss Siddal's own letters—though, unfortunately, few in number—are delightful. Mr. W. M. Rossetti gives also some of her poems. Most of these are mediocre, but one—written presumably after her marriage—is remarkable. It is called "At Last." Here are some of the stanzas:

O mother, open the window wide
And let the daylight in;
The hills grow darker to my sight,
And thoughts begin to swim.

And, mother dear, take my young son
(Since I was born of thee),
And care for all his little ways,
And nurse him on thy knee.

And, mother, wash my pale, pale hands,
And then bind up my feet;
My body may no longer rest
Out of its winding sheet.

And, mother dear, break a willow wand,
And if the sap be even,
Then save it for my lover's sake,
And he'll know my soul's in heaven.

And, mother dear, when the sun has set,
And the pale church grass waves,
Then carry me through the dim twilight,
And hide me among the graves.

We will conclude with some delicious extracts from Ford Madox Brown's diary. Brown seems to have had a most clear idea how "unusual" Rossetti and the whole environment of the P. R. B. were:

During the winter I painted the study from Emma, with the head back laughing, at night in Newman-street. All this while Rossetti was staying at Newman-street with me, keeping me up talking till 4 a.m., painting sometimes all night, making the whole place miserable, . . . translating sonnets at breakfast, working very hard and doing nothing.

Called on Dante Rossetti. Saw Miss Siddal, looking thinner and more deathlike and more beautiful and more ragged than ever; a real artist, a woman without parallel for many a long year. Gabriel, as usual, diffuse and inconsequent in his work. Drawing wonderful and lovely Guggums ["Guggums" was Miss Siddal's pet name], each one a fresh charm, each one stamped with immortality, and his picture never advancing.

Gabriel returned at half-past 12. Spent till half-past 3 getting him off and going to see him begin. Evening. jaw chiefly.

Talked about suicide and suicides with Rossetti. To bed at 5 a.m.

This morning Gabriel not yet having done his cart [the reference is to a picture], and talking quite freely about several days yet, having been here since 1st November [seven weeks], and not seeming to notice any hints, . . . Emma [Mrs. Brown] being within a week or two of her confinement, and he having had his bed made on the floor in the parlour one week now, and not getting up till eleven . . . besides my finances being reduced to £2 12s. 6d., which must last till 20th January, I told him delicately he must go.

We have not mentioned the letters from Browning, Allingham, William Bell Scott, Millais, Christina Rossetti, and others; nor the original prospectus of the firm of Morris, Marshall, Faulkner & Co.; nor the wonderful epistle from Thomas Dixon, of Sunderland, a working cork-cutter, and surely one of the most cultured working-men that ever lived. Here is his appreciation of Christina Rossetti:

I see now as I write this, in my mind's eye, the quiet face, and hear the calm, quiet voice—so full of the spirit that one finds in the simple though expressive old Fathers: a reflection to me of a deep lover of Thomas à Kempis, and of one who had achieved that rare and arduous task in this life, the realisation in actual life of the teachings of that beautiful book.

The Silence of Love.

The Silence of Love. By Edmond Holmes. (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

THE sonnet is not a form very much beloved of contemporary poets. It had its vogue a decade ago through the pervading influence and the great example of Rossetti, but it has almost vanished since then with the veering of the vane of fashion to new points of the compass. It is, therefore, something of a surprise to find Mr. Edmond Holmes making his bow to the critics with a sequence—a half-century, as the jargon used to have it—of sonnets. Not that Mr. Holmes has any ambition to revive the traditions of Pre-Raphaelitism. On the contrary, while the poets of that school used almost exclusively the Petrarchan type of sonnet, with its carefully adjusted balance of rhythm in octave and sextet, Mr. Holmes prefers the regular evolution and long drawn-out sweetness, the triple quatrains and clinching couplet, of the Shakespearean variety. He handles his chosen medium in a manner which, if not precisely masterly, is at least sufficiently above the average level as to claim the attention of all those to whom the advent of a real new poet would be a matter of some importance. For ourselves, though he has not taken our affections by storm, yet he has undeniably interested us, and has led us to examine this, his first volume, with some care, for the sake of discovering what promise and potency of song may be disclosed there. His positive qualities are, we think, two. In the first place, the architecture of his sonnetteering is extremely good. The poems are wholes, and they progress with a sustained and dignified rhythm to an effective conclusion. The final couplet, summing up and enforcing, as the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet should do, the central idea of the preceding lines, is often very felicitous. This quality of large and well-knit movement is excellently illustrated in the following example :

Stronger than life is death, for all things die.
 Stronger than death is life, for death is nought.
 Life—what is life ? A flash that streaks the sky.
 Death—what is death ? A name, a haunting thought.
 Stronger than life is death, for death subdues
 Life's flaring torchlight with its argent rays.
 Stronger than death is life, for life renews
 Through death the firesprings of its vanished days.
 Stronger than life is love, for love's warm breath
 Kindles and keeps aglow life's myriad fires.
 Stronger than death is love, for love through death
 Kindles a larger life when life expires.
 Life—what is life ? Love's foreglow in the skies.
 Death—what is death ? Love dawning on our eyes.

Secondly, Mr. Holmes's sonnets have that which Rossetti himself declared to be the first essential of successful sonnet-writing—"fundamental brain-work." He is pre-eminently a thoughtful writer. His subject is love, but in the treatment love-passion is throughout transmuted into love-philosophy. The sequence of the sonnets expresses the various phases, the ebb and flow of a love which, in the ordinary sense, is incomplete, being unspoken, but which seems to the lover, by the vision which it opens into the scheme of things, to point towards perfection. It is, in fact, the old Platonic motive of love as the starting-point of the soul on its quest for knowledge and for God. Mr. Holmes puts the idealist's case with considerable force and elevation of sentiment, and the voice of frailer humanity which finds utterance here and there lends relief and variety to what might otherwise have been a somewhat monotonous reiteration of the main theme :

Is my love wasted ? Will it never earn
 The just requital of its toil and strife ?
 I sometimes doubt if aught but love's return
 Can feed the fountain of love's inmost life :

I sometimes think the torch is burning low
 That does not kindle quick responsive fire ;
 I sometimes think the heart is beating slow
 That asks not quick fulfilment of desire.
 Vain doubts ! Vain questions ! When the queen of night
 Summons the seas to follow in her train,
 In silent answer to her silent might Sweeps round the world the tide-wave of the main :
 So when its summons comes, love does not wait
 For doubt or question, but obeys its fate.

So much for Mr. Holmes's merits. They are not inconsiderable. Idealism of thought on the one hand, simplicity and dignity of statement on the other, are not qualities to be despised in any literature. His defect, and that also no inconsiderable one, is that he is too often lacking in poignancy, too often dull. It comes, we fear, of a mistaken theory. Mr. Holmes, more than any other living poet, more even than Mr. Watson, is a reactionary in the poetic diction. Revolting, we suppose, against the affectation and extravagance of speech, from the reproach of which modern verse is not altogether free, he has gone into the opposite extreme. He has forgotten that language, if it is to remain alive at all, requires constant refreshing, that words and phrases become dusty in time, and that a metaphor, like the die of a coin, leaves a less individual and a less vivid impression upon the mind for every occasion on which it has already done service. Here, for instance, is a piece of mintage far too characteristic of Mr. Holmes's way of writing :

Then in the cloudless crystal of my love,
 I saw thee radiant as the dawn of day ;
 And on thy head love's crown was shining bright,
 Whose gems are stars, whose gold is living light.

Doubtless this kind of language, in some far distant age, possessed vitality and freshness ; but doubtless it possesses these no longer : the hungry generations have squeezed them from it ; it is as dry as a sucked orange. The use of it leaves Mr. Holmes, for all his real poetic feeling, mediocre. And mediocre he will remain, unless he can add to his interesting point of view an interesting, an intimate, a personal vocabulary.

A Scientific Evangelist.

The Life of Henry Drummond. By George Adam Smith.
 (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)

FOR writing the life of Henry Drummond Mr. Smith has many qualifications. A friend of the author from his early years, he has intimate sympathy not only with Drummond's literary and scientific sides, but with that practical religious side of which the general public knows less. Nor is he afraid to criticise his subject, as he does frankly in the case of Drummond's best-known book. He has intelligence, enthusiasm, cultivation ; and he has made a very readable and attractive biography. Indeed, with a life so many-sided, it would have been hard to fail altogether in interest. At the outset we are grateful to him for rescuing some facts in Drummond's ancestry which make a very curiously complete study in heredity. The various gifts of this remarkably many-sided man are traced back to their several sources in the family tree. Strongly religious; an eager evangelist, wielding singular power over masses of men, and especially over the young; a man of distinguished scientific attainments; a natural mesmerist; and a successful author—how did he come by all these gifts? Mr. Smith gives the answer. His father, a nurseryman at Stirling, was known for his religious character. He managed a Sunday-school, where his power over an audience of children is described as extraordinary. Drummond's scientific turn, on the other hand, came from his mother's family. Her brother, Mr. James Blackwood, was zealous in the study of science, and had, it is said, the gift of inspiring young people with enthusiasm not only in science, but also in "some forms of religious service." More striking still, he possessed the mesmeric faculty.

But the most curious thing remains. After the handwriting of Natural Law, Henry Drummond discovered some notes in the writing of his grandfather, William Drummond, upon resemblances between the laws of nature and those of the spiritual life, singularly anticipating the main thesis of his own book. It is a terrible proof that we cannot call even our thoughts our own. While Natural Law was running through its edition on edition, Grandfather Drummond must have rubbed his shadowy hands with pride. "It is my book they are making all this fuss about—the book I did not write. Not quite how I would have written it myself; but on the whole Henry has learned his lesson like a good lad." And so all his other ancestors in turn use this unconscious Henry to carry out their own pet ideas. The moral is that it is very important to choose your own ancestors.

Henry, having got himself born at Stirling, in due time went to the Stirling High School; and there we get a glimpse of him from the pen of "Ian Maclaren," so bright and characteristic that we must quote it entire:

It was in the King's Park, more than thirty years ago, that I first saw Drummond, and on our first meeting he produced the same effect upon me that he did all his after life. A cricket match between two schools had been going on all day, and was coming to an end, and I had gone out to see the result, being a new arrival in Stirling, and full of curiosity. The two lads at the wickets were in striking contrast—one heavy, stockish, and determined, who slogged powerfully, and had scored well for his side; the other nimble, alert, graceful, who had a pretty, but uncertain, play. The slogger was forcing the running, in order to make up a heavy leeway, and compelled his partner to run once too often. "It's all right, and you fellows are not to cry shame"—this was what he said as he joined his friends—"Buchanan is playing A 1, and that hit ought to have been a four; I messed the running." It was good form, of course, and what any decent lad would want to say, but there was an accent of gaiety and a certain air which was very taking. Against that group of clumsy, unformed, awkward Scots lads this bright, straight-living figure stood out in relief; and as he moved about the field my eyes followed him, and in my boyish and dull mind I had a sense that he was a type by himself, a visitor of some finer breed than those among whom he moved. By and by he mounted a friend's pony, and galloped along the racecourse of the park till one only saw a speck of white in the sunlight, and still I watched in wonder and fascination—only a boy of thirteen or so, and dull—till he came back in time to cheer the slogger, who had pulled off the match with three runs to spare—and carried his bat.

"Well played, old chap," the pure, clear, joyous note rang out on the evening air; "finest thing you've ever done," while the strong-armed, heavy-faced slogger stood still and looked at him in admiration and made amends. "I say, Drummond, it was my blame you were run out." Drummond was his name, and someone said "Henry." So I first saw my friend.

What impressed me that pleasant evening in the days of long ago I can now identify. It was the lad's distinction, and inherent quality of appearance, and manner of character and soul, which marked him and made him solitary.

It is a description of Drummond which will stand for him throughout his life. All accounts speak of the tall, graceful figure, the radiant face, the radiant manner, the gentlemanly distinction which won from younger men the name of "The Prince." But beyond this was that mesmeric power which he did not consciously develop till he was at Edinburgh University. There, in the intervals of lectures and reading, he began to practise hypnotism on his fellow-students.

Mr. McCulloch relates how a student came into his room one day, unhooked his watch and handed it to Mr. McCulloch. Drummond had been practising on him, and he had no recollection of the action, till Mr. McCulloch returned the watch, saying: "This kind of thing must cease." It was supposed that Drummond became alarmed at discovering the command he had gained over a class-mate when he was at a distance from him. At any rate, the experiments did cease. But in reality he never exercised such triumphant mesmeric power as when he supposed himself to have abandoned it. The true function of such a gift is not to make people do odd things unconsciously, but to make them do good things consciously. Drummond's life was one long exhibition of mesmerism.

It began when he was but twenty-three, and still a divinity-student, with the still-remembered visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to this country. He threw himself eagerly into their work, accompanying them in their progress through the kingdom, and at once found himself in possession of extraordinary influence. His meetings were crowded; young people flocked to him for counsel, and poured their private confessions into his ears. Thenceforward mission-work became the aim of his life. Yet with all this he preserved his liberal interests. He accompanied Sir Archibald Geikie on a geological expedition to the Rocky Mountains. It was on his return from another scientific expedition to Central Africa that he found himself famous throughout England as the author of Natural Law in the Spiritual World, which had appeared after he left the country. Yet while the Press showered praises, and Society invitations on him, he simply went back to his mission-work. The only value of his success to him seems to have been the throng of letters it brought him from souls in trouble. The movements, missionary and otherwise, which he started, are too many to catalogue. In Edinburgh University and Oxford, in Yale and Harvard, he exercised his moral fascination over youth; he carried his energies through Scotland, England, Wales, America, Australia. It is a singular spectacle; this zealous scientist, famous author, popular gentleman, hearty enjoyer of life—fond of fishing, shooting, cricket, football, jest and joviality—deliberately devoting his life to the work of a missionary to the young. Himself cheerful, brimming with health, he was confessor to innumerable souls, male and female, by letter or in person. His books were accidents, his missions were his life. If one had to seek a parallel, it would be Gordon; and indeed there is much resemblance. Drummond, too, had his private and inconspicuous Khar-toum. During the last two years of his short life he was slowly dying from an agonising disease, yet he retained his cheery sympathy to the last, bravely hiding his sufferings from the eyes of his friends.

It may be doubted whether his books, with all their merits, will hold their place when the questions of the day, which gave them instant appeal, have become questions of yesterday. His most celebrated book, Natural Law, Mr. Smith refuses to consider his best, alleging arguments against its thesis which have often much force. But it broke new ground, it was stimulative, it was lucidly, if not altogether perspicuously, written, and it was sincere. It had a flash of insight, though the insight was partial; and the mistakes of some men are more fruitful than the correctness of others. Yet, on the whole, perhaps Drummond himself was right; and his most enduring work is that of which the polite world thinks least—that and the example of a life which illustrates Crashaw's couplet:

A happy soul which all the way
To heaven has a summer's day.

A life, none the less, which had its fiery and patient suffering at the last.

Colour in Nature.

Colour in Nature. By Marion I. Newbigin. (John Murray. 7s. 6d.)

THIS book deserves high praise, for it possesses two merits, one of which is too often present without the other. The authoress has well mastered the facts of the subject-matter wherewith she deals, and describes them fully and lucidly. She has also paid careful attention to the various, including the most recent, hypotheses which have been put forward respecting the development of colour in the organic world, but abstains with praiseworthy caution from assenting to any of them in the absence of sufficient evidence.

In her volume of 325 pages, after pointing out the difference between colours due to the presence of pigments and those which result from structure, and after describing and classifying pigments, the authoress proceeds to describe the development of colour in different groups of organisms. Beginning with colour as met with in plants, she depicts, in successive chapters, the colours found in protozoa, sponges, and in cœlentera; in worms; in crustacea and echinoderma; in lepidoptera; in insects in general and in spiders; in mollusca; in fishes; in amphibians and in reptiles; and, finally (in three chapters), the colours in birds and beasts.

The authoress calls attention to the fact that the colours of organisms have relation not only to their environment, but also to the inner nature and physiology of the creatures they adorn or characterise, referring her readers to Mr. F. E. Beddard's work, Animal Coloration, and to Mr. W. Bateson's Materials for the Study of Variation. One interesting phenomenon is the use of waste products to the production of colour in the lower animals. Thus uric acid may be stored up in the wings of Lepidoptera, and serve as a colouring agent, those organs, being relatively non-vital parts, being thus able to harbour poisonous substances within them without injury to the organism. Speaking broadly, it may be said the higher the nature of the animal the more completely are its waste-products eliminated.

What will most interest the general reader is the question of the utility of colour and its consequent relation to Darwin's theory of "natural selection." He, as she well expresses it, "endeavoured to prove that the balance of nature is so finely adjusted that the slightest oscillation of one part may affect parts apparently far removed from it, and that the struggle for existence is so keen that all specific characters are, as it were, maintained at the point of the sword."

In estimating the value of any hypothesis, an admirable canon, which the authoress quotes, was laid down by Prof. Sedgwick at the third Zoological Congress (held at Leyden in 1896) in the following words:

A theory to be of any value must explain the whole body of facts with which it deals. If it falls short of this, it must be held to be insufficient and inadequate; and when, at the same time, it is so masterful as to compel men to look at nature through its eyes, and to twist stubborn and unconformable facts into accord with its dogmas, then it becomes an instrument of mischief and deserves condemnation, if only of the mild kind implied by the term inadequate.

Now the explanation of colour at present most popular among scientists is the explanation through "natural selection resulting in a multitude of cases in what is known as 'mimicry.'" This explanation does not yet satisfy the mind of our authoress. Thus she criticises (at p. 303) Prof. Poulton's contention that the buff-tip moth resembles a broken piece of lichen-covered stick. A friend of his had raised the objection that the moth resembles a piece of stick cut cleanly at both ends, an object which is never seen in nature. To this Prof. Poulton replied that the purple and grey colour of the sides of the moth, together with the pale yellow tint of the parts which support the broken ends, present a most perfect resemblance to wood in which decay has induced that peculiar texture in which the tissue breaks shortly and sharply, as if cut, on the application of slight pressure or the force of an insignificant blow. On this Marion Newbigin remarks:

These statements, whatever else they do, certainly display a most profound faith in the efficiency of natural selection as a factor in evolution. The efficiency in this case seems almost excessive; one cannot help wondering whether a protective resemblance which was a little less laboured would not have served the purpose.

Again, there are certain tropical American leaf-cutting ants which carry pieces of leaf about the size of a sixpence, which they hold vertically in their jaws. An insect, not an ant, found there resembles an ant, and has a thin expansion, which imitates the leaf carried by the ants; so that, in Prof. Poulton's words, the insect "mimicked the ant, together with its leafy burden." As to this, our authority remarks: "Now, as it is only the homeward-bound ants which carry pieces of leaves, it seems in this case also that the protective resemblance is unnecessarily laborious; something less might surely have served." Besides the views of Mr. Darwin and Dr. Wallace, those of Mr. Cunningham, Prof. Eimer, Dr. Simroth, and Herr Otto Wiener are also taken into account. The last two authors are convinced that a caterpillar may come to resemble its environment because its skin can photograph that environment by means of the sensitive compounds of its own tissues. As to adult insects, we read (p. 325) that there is indeed much evidence to show that in the case of butterflies the colours can be influenced by their surroundings.

A criticism of a case of alleged mimicry is cited (pp. 318-321) which we have not space to quote, and we must, therefore, refer those interested in it to Marion Newbigin's pages. She says about it:

Very few cases of mimicry have been subjected to such authoritative criticism; and the fact that they have not stood the ordeal furnishes a strong presumption that a large number of the cases contained in the literature of the subject are likewise valueless (p. 321). In the view of the popularisers of the subject it has become the main object of the naturalist to invent as ingenious an explanation as possible of the way in which it (colour) is useful. If the naturalist's powers of invention fail, though this happens but rarely, then the colour is non-significant, or, better still, the animal has recently changed its habitat, and is no longer perfectly adapted to its environment (p. 306).

After weighing and balancing the question with great care and moderation, the authoress comes to the following final conclusion:

It must be obvious from the above discussion that there are great difficulties in the acceptance of natural selection as the most important factor in the evolution of colour, and that there is little doubt that its aid has been invoked in far too reckless a fashion. At the same time, it must be confessed that there is not as yet in the field a complete and cogent theory which is capable of dispensing with natural selection; whether this is due to ignorance of physiology or to the real importance of this factor must be left to the future to decide.

A Monarch for Romance.

Charles XII. of Sweden. By Oscar Browning. (Hurst & Blackett. 16s.)

MR. OSCAR BROWNING is a person of such manifold and varied activity that one is apt, if not a King's man, to forget that he lectures on history. In that cultured leisure which he spares from the perusal of Dante and the gentle intercourse of enlightened undergraduates he has produced a small harvest of historical researches in which the picturesque is neatly sandwiched between accurate, prosaic facts. His "Flight to Varennes" achieved some notability in this respect, and is a triumph of speculative criticism as applied to second-hand evidence. In dealing with Charles XII. of Sweden he is on surer, if not less romantic ground, and praise must be awarded for a lucid popular account of those wars and adventures which were at once the delight and the terror of Europe. Perhaps Mr. Browning hardly does his hero justice. He is so ready to apologise for his errors, either on the score of innate obstinacy or of a touch of madness, that one loses the charm which made Charles a mystical hero even to the Turks, on whom he foisted himself for three years as an expensive and burdensome guest. The glory of Charles's successes is overcast by the detailed treatment accorded to his failures. One scarcely sees him at his greatest for the ever-present premonition of his downfall. Yet there was something intensely wonderful about his successes, just as there was about his failures. No beardless boy since Alexander ever took the field with such a confidence that victory and empire were his birthright; and Charles was a harder campaigner than even Alexander. He had no Babylon to his discredit. Tough as whipcord, trained to bear pain and hardship, he lived and fought as severely as a private soldier, and moulded his armies by sheer force of example. No Swede ever ran from a superior enemy under his generalship; and that they did so at Poltava, the fatal field which ruined his fortunes, was largely due to his being incapacitated by a wound. The story of his capture in Turkey (the "Kalabalik" or lion hunt), of his sojourn at Demurtasch, and his adventurous ride across Europe in disguise, are materials that a historian with an eye for the picturesque could not fail to make attractive, as is also the case with his death by an unknown hand at the siege of Frederickshald. More care might with advantage have been taken in reading the proofs of the book, which is full of omissions and slips. In describing complicated operations, difficult to follow at the best, it is no help to read "Swede" where the word should have been "Pole," and vice versa. These things are blemishes on an otherwise respectable work.

The Country Parson.

George Herbert's Country Parson. Edited by H. C. Beeching. (Blackwell. 3s. 6d.)

WHEN George Herbert, whom it was once the fashion to call "saintly," but who was in truth a very witty saint, and something of a fine gentleman as well, took up his living at Bemerton, he set down in writing some rules of pastoral conduct, in order that "time might not insensibly blot them out of his memory, but that the next year might show him his variations from this year's resolutions." These rules, revised, one may suppose, in the light of actual pastoral experience, formed the substance of The Country Parson: his Character and Rule of Holy Life, published after the author's death by Mr. Barnabas Oley, by many others since then, and now, lastly, by Mr. Beeching in an exceptionally charming and attractive form. Those who know Mr. Beeching's work will not need to be told that his introduction and notes display not only a marked spiritual and literary sympathy with Herbert, but also a delicate humour, which plays discreetly round the weaknesses and limitations of Walton's beloved divine. Herbert's treatise, indeed, has much wisdom in it, and, as Mr. Beeching well says, is "full from end to end of a sweet reasonableness," but it cannot be denied that it often reflects an ideal of clerical life which it is hard to accept nowadays, and occasionally one which it is open to you to suspect was never very practical. Herbert had been Public Orator at Cambridge, and one fears that his rhetoric never quite accommodated itself to the facts of existence in a Wiltshire village; and, unlike his editor, he is somewhat lacking in humour.

Perhaps occasionally [says Mr. Beeching] he carries the tendency to philosophise a little far, as when he finds a reason in the nature of things for the parson's keeping pigs and poultry. Perhaps occasionally also he elaborates what even to country parsons is pretty obvious, as when he gives three rules for ascertaining when one has had enough dinner.

Again: "Perhaps, too, a country parson here and there will turn with interest to the chapter headed 'The Parson's Library,' only to read with dismay: 'The Country Parson's library is a holy life.'" Nevertheless, the book is one which should be on the bookshelves of every curate.

Irish Humour.

Irish Life and Character. By Michael MacDonagh. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

MR. MICHAEL MACDONAGH says in his preface that he will be disappointed if the book is regarded simply as a collection of droll stories. We do not wish to disappoint Mr. MacDonagh, but that is the way we regard it. To justify his title it would be necessary to do far more than Mr. MacDonagh has done: he has, for example, taken almost no account at all of Irish tenderness, which is a notable quality. "Irish Wit and Humour" would have described this work better than its present style. But as a collection of good Irish stories (and some that are located in Ireland, but had, we suspect, other origin) Mr. MacDonagh's volume is unequalled. There is hardly a page without a delightful Hibernicism, and many pages have several. Some are characteristic, and some are not; but very few are unworthy of their place. These are, as a rule, the new ones.

Yet with Mr. MacDonagh's presentation of his material we are often disposed to quarrel. "Two women," he says, "were discussing the merits of a certain blend of tea. 'Oh, its shuper-excellent,' said one; 'it takes such a fine grip of the second relay of wather.' There could be no better recommendation of tea in Ireland [adds the author], where families being large and money scarce, and tea a favourite drink, a 'second relay of wather' in the teapot is often necessary." Now this comment is absurd. Irish life and character are not illumined thus; for there is hardly a family in the world, whether rich or poor, where the tea is not recruited with a second relay of water. Moreover, the story has for years been told also of a thrifty Scotch housewife who commended her brand because it took such a grip of "the thir-r-d watter." When the third relay is mentioned we at once get a sidelight on character, because, although a second relay is universal, a third relay betokens canniness and economy.

In another place Mr. MacDonagh tells a short story of an old woman whom he found smoking. He asked how long she had practised the habit. "Her reply was, 'I tuk to it as a bit of divarshion after me poor old man was tucked under the daisies.'" This is good; but Mr. MacDonagh must needs spoil it with one of the most superfluous pieces of translation in the world. "This [he warns us] was her way of saying that she took to the pipe as a comfort after the death of her husband." Of course it was—what else could it have been? It is blemishes of this kind, together with much extraneous matter, that prejudices us against Mr. MacDonagh's book as anything but a treasury of humorous remarks. He has not the comprehensive outlook or penetrating sympathy to deal adequately with Irish life and character. Yet, as we have said, he has made a very entertaining collection of anecdotes.

Intentions.

IF our world is but a sleeping room, and life is only a dream—then I wish my few years should flit away in good dreams.

Then I wish dreams of freedom and happiness like those the great gentlemen dream of; then I want to see pleasant sights in my dream and I do not want to dream of tears.

And if our world is a feast, a ball, and we the invited guests, then I, too, wish to be seated comfortably in the hall and have my own good share of the banquet.

And if our world is now a battlefield where the strong struggle with the weak—then, in spite of storm, and wife and child, I shall not stand coldly aside.

Then I thrust myself into the fire, become a hero and battle like a lion for the weak; and if the bullet strike me, and I fall dead on the field—then I, too, can die laughing.

From Morris Rosenfeld's "Songs of the Ghetto."

Fiction.

Microft of Withens. By Halliwell Sutcliffe.
(Unwin 6s.)

IN this novel Mr. Sutcliffe once more gives us one of his pictures of the strong, lusty, hard-living men of the Yorkshire moors; and as he has gone back to 1745 for a plot, their savage vices and virtues gain in naturalness from their setting in a ruder age. He has also invented a capital story, so that the book may be heartily recommended to those who love drinking and fighting scenes and the play of those elementary passions, love and revenge. Also, our author has an eye for character, and his stage is ever crowded with energetic and individualised personages.

But the book would have been vastly improved—at least, from the more fastidious point of view—if he had taken a little more pains to make it credible. Its central fact is that a body of disciplined and trained gentlemen robbers took possession of a dark and almost impregnable dale near Skipton and held it for over seventy years, murdering men, outraging women, and living by robbery. And if this were true of the Yorkshire of the eighteenth century, still the Carlesses are so like the Doons, Kit is so like Jan and Jessie like Lorna, that artistically the whole is condemned.

On a minor point we should like information. "Master," as a territorial title, has been a favourite with novelists since ever the Master of Ballantrae appeared—perhaps ever since Scott invented the Master of Ravenswood—but is there any authority for applying it to a Yorkshire yeoman? We are reversing the rules of rhetoric, and coming down from the important to the trivial, but what did gentlemen get drunk on in 1745? When Mr. Sutcliffe's heroes give it a name it is usually rum or punch, but would not October or wine be a more natural beverage? Fielding did not die till 1754, and a few years before that he issued a warning to the nation against the use of gin, which was then beginning to supersede ale, and the characters of his fiction nearly all drink beer. Punch belongs rather to the Dickens period. Would a landlord call his place a "public" in 1745? Surely that horrid modernism had not yet replaced inn, tavern, hostelry. Further, the Silent Inn strikes us as an absurd sign-post for the time, or any time.

And now may we conclude by offering Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe a piece of advice? It appears to us that he has two essentials of a good novel-writer: a fine insight into character and an independent outlook. Nor do these exhaust his merits. He makes a most dramatic use of the curious superstitions of his dales-folk, and he has the art of narration. But two things are necessary if he would master the art of writing fiction. The first is, that he should learn to read and admire without being led into imitation—this book, for instance, is too flagrantly Lorna-Doonish and yet devoid of the Blackmore personality, wherein lies the inimitable charm of that masterpiece; and secondly, if his ambition is high, he must take more pains. He knows, no doubt, the definition of genius, and the artistic and the slipshod cannot dwell in the same tent.

Old Chester Tales. By Margaret Deland.
(Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

THIS book combines, as far as is possible, the quality of a long novel with the quality of short stories. For Mrs. Deland's eight stories are laid in one quiet town in Pennsylvania, and the same characters—notably the wise, lovable old minister, Dr. Lavendar—are met with in them all.

How many capital short stories have crossed the Atlantic to us from such places as Old Chester! Yet the charm and freshness and quaintness and humour of these new ones are not the less complete. Mrs. Deland brings a very tender, laughing sympathy (not without its humorous perversities) to the delineation of her out-of-the-world folk—the Wrights, the Days, the Barkleys, the John Smiths, the Jay girls, and all the other folk who constituted Old Chester.

Not for a long while, in fact, have we read a better short story than the second of this series, called "Good for the Soul." Here we learn how Peter Day began life when he was fifty years of age. Until then he had been ruled by his stern mother. Ruled by her he had grown rich; but he knew nothing of wickedness, he had not been to a theatre, he had not loved—in a word, he had not lived. Then his mother died, and Peter slowly and painfully realised that he might do as he pleased. At first it pleased him to go on as before, to shun society, and live a narrow life.

Then he awoke. Simple as a child, Peter fell in love with one of the "Four Sisters Montagu" who brought their "Side-splitting Farce," their leers and dances to Old Chester. Stricken at once by the charms of Bessie, the première danseuse, Peter left his farm and followed the troupe (a great pure-hearted booby) from town to town. The sisters laughed at him; even Bessie laughed, with a catch in her throat, but when Mamie said "He is an innocent" (Peter imagined they were really sisters and that their names were really Montagu) Bessie added "He's good."

She was as inconsequent and unmoral, this little, flashing, suffering, pretty creature, as the sparkle on a rippling wave. And she was just now almost at the limit of her strength. The simple-hearted man who, through his big, steel-rimmed spectacles, looked at her every morning, as silent and as faithful as a dog, saw in her all the beauty and grace and good nature of which his harmless life had been starved. He thought to himself, over and over, how pleasant she was. He had had little enough pleasantness in his forty-odd years, dear knows! so it was easy to recognise it when he saw it.

How these two wedded, and were happy, is not the whole story. Ten years after the wedding there slowly settled down on Peter's wife the shadow of her past. Ought she to have told Peter all? With an art and tenderness which we are glad to proclaim, Mrs. Deland shows us Bessie—now Mrs. Day—reflecting and resolving. But before she stabbed old Peter with her long-sheathed confession she would see Dr. Lavendar. How the wise old doctor rolled away the whole cloud is the climax of the story, and must not be revealed here. If pathos, humour, sound sense, and a happy ending can make a story charming, then this story is charming.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE DEAR IRISH GIRL.

BY KATHARINE TYNAN.

The current is setting towards Ireland again. Not that Scotland is being deserted, but we notice this week a work on Irish humour, a volume of Irish plays, and here is an Irish novel. Mrs. Hinkson (Katharine Tynan), who is better known as a poet than a novelist, has written a pretty story of the love affairs of the charming Biddy. It is a book rich with the brogue, good-humoured and bright, but with its sad moments. In the end all is well, and Biddy marries O'Hara, and the three Miss Flaherties are bridesmaids. (Smith & Elder. 6s.)

RED ROCK.

BY THOMAS NELSON PAGE.

In this novel we have a series of vivid pictures of life in the Southern States of America in the "era of reconstruction," as it is called, just after the Civil War. The passing away of the old régime with its fine old family life, its gentility and charm, is sketched by Mr. Page from memory. But the North is neither unrepresented nor ill-treated in the story. The love element is strong, and everywhere is a wealth of local colour. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE VISION SPLENDID.

BY FLORENCE BRIGHT AND ROBERT MACHRAY.

The Vision Splendid is the Stage, and to Jean Murray, a young girl who has just lost her father, it appeals with overwhelming power. This novel is occupied with her adventures as an actress, and is a careful study of stage-life from the point of view of a beginner. There is this passage about Fleet-street and the Strand in which the Press, the Law, and the Stage have their centres. "The first excites and then gratifies public curiosity—an intelligent interest in the affairs of the world, the newspapers call it, laughing in their sleeves the while. In the second men pick each other's brains to enable them to pick other people's pockets, and to prevent anyone else from doing so. The third provides a house of refuge from the garrulity of the one and a place of escape from the bickerings of the other, and ministers to the amusement of everybody." (Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

INFATUATION.

BY B. M. CROKER.

Mrs. Croker's novels are usually serene and engrossing love-stories. This one is also like that. We notice that the hero meets the heroine in Basle railway station. After giving her some needed help and lending her three pounds, he sees her off, handing her his card. Later he discovers that his blank and printed cards are mixed up in his pocket-book. "I'll bet anything I've given her a blank one," he muttered, and he had. By such small and pleasant devices Mrs. Croker holds her readers. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

THE ARCHDEACON.

BY MRS. WALFORD.

A story of modern London society. The book is a little epic of match-making. All the mothers are on the look-out for young men; all the girls are speculating on their chances. Mrs. Walford can manage such a theme as this as well as anyone, and the book is quite entertaining. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE DUKE'S SERVANTS.

BY SIDNEY HERBERT BURCHELL.

A pleasant story of the second quarter of the seventeenth century, laid partly in the country and partly in London. We see a good deal of theatrical life, and Shakespeare is alluded to as within living memory. "In three or four days," says the hero, an actor about to return to town and the Fortune Theatre, "I shall hear all the sounds of London streets, its unfortunate apprentices, its packmen, its fruit-sellers; and I shall smell all its smells, some pleasant, some less pleasant than the scent of sweet lavender and juniper. But I love them all, the shouts of the people, the smells of the streets; but no sounds will echo so pleasantly in my ears as those of my own trumpets, and the noise of my own musicians in the Fortune." (Gay & Bird. 6s.)

IN THE TSAR'S DOMINIONS.

BY LE VOLEUR.

This is a love-story laid in the Kherson "Government" of Russia and in Moscow. The terrible disaster on the Khodinsky Plain during the present Tsar's coronation festivities is introduced, and there are the usual explosives. (Hutchinson & Co. 6s.)

LITTLE KING RANNIE.

BY M. E. WINCHESTER.

A moving story of shipwreck and a baby which is saved and kept by a young married couple who are in constant dread of it being claimed. The child was claimed and the foster-parents died, and on "a costly monument of pure white marble, which would attract crowds to come and gaze on its sculptured beauty in the days of the future," there were chiselled the words: "Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages."—Exodus ii. 9. (Digby & Long. 6s.)

ASHES OF EMPIRE.

BY R. W. CHAMBERS.

A glowing, mercurial story of the Franco-Prussian War and the Paris of those times, by the author of The King in Yellow and The Red Republic. Mr. Chambers knows his Paris well. He begins the book—which is breathless and noisy (like its subject)—with the flight of the Empress and ends it in March of 1871. There is not only revolution and battle, there is love and romance. Two young Americans are the joint heroes, and among the names we find Victorien Sardou. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE ATTACK ON THE FARM.

BY A. W. ARNOLD.

By a coincidence the author of this book, which is published at the same time as Mr. Chambers's Ashes of Empire, asks how it is that so few writers seek their material in the Franco-Prussian War. He does so himself in two or three of these stories; in the others he is ingenious or sentimental or romantic. A readable collection. (F. V. White. 6s.)

FETTERED BY FATE.

BY G. W. MILLER.

The first sentence of this novel runs to fourteen lines, and the second sentence to seventeen. The story is melodrama, beginning with the wrongful conviction of the hero for murder, and ending with a burning schooner whose powder magazine explodes and hurls the pirates "into countless heights above." (Digby & Long. 6s.)

A PRINCE FROM THE GREAT NEVER NEVER.

BY MARY F. A. TENCH.

The Prince is Molly Despard's lover and the Great Never Never is an Australian wilderness, which he enters with an exploring party, while Molly waits in old Ireland for him at Knock-na-mulla, a village so remote from the railway that the car which met the trains "might almost be regarded as the triumph of hope over experience." A pleasant love-story with a strong vein of Irish humour. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

VANYA.

BY OLGA ORLOFF.

A short story of prison life in Siberia. (Grant & Son. 1s.)

ELECTRA PECTORIS.

BY S. P. E.

This "novel without a villain" is a little farcical love-story which may be read in twenty minutes. (A. T. Hutchinson. 1s.)

The Lower Beasts and Man.

WHEN Banks and Solander, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, first landed on the shores of Australia, it might well have seemed to them that in a dream they had visited another planet. For they found that every kind of shrub and tree, and every kind of beast and bird, was new, and most of them strangely different from those previously found elsewhere. As the nature of the beasts there discovered became better known, it became also more and more evident that they formed a very distinct group (a distinct order), having no affinity with animals found elsewhere, with one exception. That one exception was the opossum, which had been noticed by Hernandez (in his history of Mexico) as long ago as 1626, while its anatomy was described by Tyson in 1698. It had then been duly noted that its hind paw was a hand like that of a monkey, and that the female habitually carried her young in a pouch. The same habit was found to be also the case with the Australian beasts, and so they, except the native dog or dingo, the bats, and a rat or two, and the various species of opossum inhabiting America, became grouped together in an order of "pouched beasts," or marsupials. By degrees it became known that these marsupials were generally distinguished from all other beasts by various peculiarities, in addition to the "pouch." One very special character concerned the mode of formation of the placenta, or vascular structure, whereby the young of man and beasts are nourished in the womb. As more and more kinds of marsupial animals were discovered, they were found to differ greatly in structure from one another—some to resemble cats and dogs, others to recall to mind insect-eating beasts (such as the mole, the hedgehog, and the shrews); others were like flying-squirrels; a few to have front teeth resembling those of the beaver and other rodents (i.e., rats, mice, marmots, &c.); while the kangaroos, by their long hind limbs and powers of rapid locomotion, reminded the observer of the group of antelopes belonging to the hoofed beasts, or ungulata. These various sub-divisions of the marsupial order thus seemed to run parallel to the various long-before familiar sub-divisions of non-marsupial (or ordinary) beasts—namely, carnivores, insectivores, rodents, ungulates, &c.

But besides the many marsupial animals found in Australia, there were two others also there found the structure of which was soon seen to be more exceptional and peculiar than that of any other kinds of beasts whatsoever. One of these animals was the "duck-billed platypus" or Ornithorhynchus, and the other was the "spiny ant-eater" or Echidna. Their sexual organs were strangely different from those of all other beasts—on which account they have been called Monotremes—while the bones of their breast and shoulder resembled those of various lizards. Most noteworthy of all their characteristics, however, is the fact that, unlike all other beasts, they lay eggs, though the young, when hatched, are nourished by the milk of the mother.

What, then, have been the genetic relations of these three groups of animals to each other, and what was the origin of the whole group of mammals? Such problems were, among others, recently discussed at Cambridge.

Putting aside, for the moment, the platypus and echidna, let us consider the nature of the Australian marsupials. Were they the earlier form of mammalian life whence all these far more numerous non-marsupial forms have been evolved?

Such a view was put forward by some eminent men, among others by the late Prof. Huxley in 1880. According to that view, non-marsupial carnivores, insectivores, rodents, ungulates, &c., respectively sprang from the marsupial carnivores, insectivores, rodents, ungulates, &c. But this hypothesis is now generally abandoned, and the marsupials are deemed an integral group which at some period were developed from non-marsupial beasts. Prof. Haeckel, however, in this case, as also in the question as to the origin of man, showed himself, at Cambridge, to be a true conservative. He declared that he "adhered to the view of the origin of non-marsupial mammals from marsupials." This question is one which affects ourselves. Since man is a non-marsupial mammal, it follows that to answer it correctly determines whether or not he has to regard the opossum and its allies as among his direct ancestors.

Now some facts favour the view, still adhered to by Haeckel. Among the many strange and, to us, new Australian forms of life, there is one which is exceedingly old. This very antique creature is the mud-fish (Ceratodus) of Queensland, which resembles most closely an ancient fish the remains of which are imbedded in the triassic rocks, which are the lowest of the "secondary" series, though more recent than the coal measures.

If, then, we have so ancient a fish still surviving in Australia, may it not be probable that the beasts which have their home there are also survivors from the most primitive kinds of beast? To this question Prof. Osborn replied, at Cambridge, in the negative; and, indeed, as before said, the prevailing view now is that the marsupials are, as it were, a lateral offshoot from the mammalian genealogical tree, which ascends from pre-mammalian forms direct to man. A discovery by Prof. Hill that in two Australian marsupials (one an insectivorous one, while the other is the kuala or "native-bear") the placenta differs greatly in structure from the rest of the order, and approaches that of non-marsupial beasts, breaks down one very marked distinction previously supposed to absolutely characterise the whole marsupial group of beasts. What, then, were the earlier forms of mammalian life—alike the parents of both our existing marsupial and non-marsupial beasts? The answer to this question may surprise some of the readers of the ACADEMY. Among the animals which now inhabit the earth are some modest and inconspicuous kinds, which attract but little the attention of persons who are neither agriculturalists nor men of science. Such are the mole, the hedgehog, and the shrews, often called in error "shrew-mice." Of hedgehogs there are some twenty kinds distributed over Europe, Africa, Northern Asia, and Hindostan. Moles and mole-like creatures range through the Northern hemisphere, while shrews are almost all over the world, save in Australia and South America.

All these animals feed on insects and other small creatures, and belong to the order of beasts known as "insectivores." But there are other kinds of insectivores not found in England or even Europe. Thus the Gymnura—a form allied to the hedgehog, but without spines—comes from the Indian Archipelago and the Malay Peninsula. The same region is tenanted by some very elegant, squirrel-like insectivores, which are known as *Tupaia*s or "tree-shrews." In Africa there are others with long hind-legs, which jump as kangaroos do, and may be named "jumping-shrews." Another West African form has put on almost quite the form and appearance of an otter (named Potomogale), while in South Africa there are very curious burrowing forms called "golden moles," though they are by no means true moles. In that very zoologically interesting island Madagascar several species of spiny insectivores exist, the type of which is known as Centeles. Finally, in the islands of Hayti and Cuba there respectively exist two very peculiar long-snouted, naked-tailed species, which form a genus which has been termed Solenodon.

It is an interesting fact that this insectivorous order of mammals is spread all over the world save in South America and Australia. In the former region they are replaced by many different species of opossum; while in Australia their place is taken by other various small marsupials of different kinds.

Now, the great interest possessed by these insectivores is twofold: (1) In the first place it consists in the fact that they bear certain noteworthy resemblances to one or other forms of marsupial life; (2) they show other resemblances to creatures which were among the earlier forms of beasts the fossil remains of which science has revealed to us.

All readers, no doubt, know that the rocks above the chalk—the tertiary series—consist of three sets, the oldest of which is termed eocene. Certain eocene fossils discovered by the late Prof. Cope were classed by him in a group termed Creodonta, and some of them he considered to have been ancestral forms of our present insectivores. But below the chalk, in the rocks known as the trias and the oolite, remains of small beasts have long been known to exist the nature of which is still somewhat problematical. At first they were thought to be marsupial, but this is now much doubted.

At the recent Cambridge Congress Prof. Osborn declared that "there was abundant evidence that many of these small beasts were not marsupials but insectivores, fulfilling all the conditions required by the ancestry of the living Insectivora and the Creodonta, and, through the latter, of all the higher existing types of mammals, including man." This view the present writer regards as the most probably correct one, and, according to it, the whole marsupial group must be regarded as a lateral offshoot from the genealogical tree of mammalian life, yet one coming forth above the insectivorous branch, and a portion above that branch, or part of the stem represented by the extinct Creodonta.

The question as to the origin of the whole class of mammals, though much debated at Cambridge, is one which our limits do not allow us here to enter upon. It must now suffice to say that the remarkable resemblances which exist between the monotremes and reptiles, together with different mammalian characters found here and there in different groups of extinct reptilian forms, makes it almost evident that the class Mammalia, as a whole, was derived by development and evolution from the class Reptilia.

Nordau Reconsidered.

To take up to-day Nordau's Degeneration, which, Heaven help our public! went through eight English editions, is to see how perfectly it represents the attitude of all modern commercialised society towards art. Degeneration is, strictly speaking, the reductio ad absurdum of the utilitarian theory in the life of the middle classes. All the ignorance, prejudice, and limitations of the average man in matters æsthetic were deified there, and set up before his delighted eyes as scientific truths. Nordau, in the name of the outraged community, proposed three tests for whole legions of the unhappy artists he examined—viz.: (a) The Test of Indecency; (b) the Test of Obscurity; (c) the Test of Singularity; and no great artist satisfied the requirements of the examining board. It was very difficult for them to get through, poor darlings. Thus: Ibsen was "a malignant, anti-social simpleton"; Walt Whitman was "a vagabond, a reprobate rake, and morally insane"; Tolstoi's talent was "made up of morbid hyperesthesia and emotional gigantism"; Verlaine was "a wicked angel grown old"; Rossetti, Morris, and the pre-Raphaelites were "mattoids, imbeciles with the livery, but without the fecund originality of genius" (vide Lombroso's Test, Century Mag., October, 1895); Wagner was "crazy, and not a genius," &c.; and to prevent the Ibsens, Tolstois, Whitmans, Rossettis, Wagners, &c., infecting the community's moral health, Nordau proposed that an association composed of the people's leaders and instructors, professors, authors, members of Parliament, judges, high functionaries, should have the power to exercise an irresistible boycott. Let the Society for Ethical Culture undertake to examine into the morality of artistic and literary productions . . . work and man should be annihilated. No respectable bookseller would keep the condemned book; no respectable paper would mention it, or give the author access to its columns; no respectable family would permit the branded work to be in their house;" . . . (p. 559).

The absurdity of Nordau's charlatanism was, of course, hidden under such a cloud of pseudo scientific terminology that the English middle classes really did believe that Nordau was an authority on art; but in reality Nordau in all the two hundred thousand words of Degeneration addressed only one argument to the public—viz., These great artists must be mad, because they don't believe in you. And to expand this argument a little one may re-state it thus:

The community is forced to believe in the ideals of which its own life is an expression. If the artist (a) (as Tolstoi) holds up other ideals, (b) (as Ibsen) exhibits the public in an unfavourable light, (c) (as Maeterlinck, Rossetti, &c.) is not understood by the public, he is not in harmony with his environment, and is consequently an enemy to society and society's ideals.

Nordau complicated matters for the critics (and this, no doubt, was partly the reason that the English Press attached great weight to the book) by condemning as anti-social all the ideas and sentiments of artists which clash as truths with the truths of scientific men. Whereas, of course, the evolution of science has been too rapid to suit the evolution of society, and just as too rapid an introduction of material science into the life of the people has produced the hideous physical conditions of the factory towns, so the over-commercialisation of society has had a coarsening and hardening effect on the spiritual life of the middle classes. But modern art, as Morris's, in striving to reach back to the more beautiful ideals of ancient society, is either atavistic or imbecile (vide Lombroso); or, as Ibsen's, in striving to show modern society its false ideals, is anti-social and degenerate (vide Nordau).

Nordau's book would not be worth reconsideration for a moment if it were not a very curious illustration of the extreme difficulty with which art can convey anything to the mind of a naturally inartistic people. Had Degeneration been a less vulgar piece of nineteenth century sensationalism it would not have mirrored in so faithful a manner a commercialised public's attitude towards art; but, as it stands, the critic may reverse Nordau's conclusions altogether, and, thus reversed, these conclusions run:

Modern art, where it is morbidly analytic (as Zola's), is healthy in its tendencies, as revealing the evils of modern society to itself.

Where modern art is mediæval and mystical (as the Symbolists') the result is a necessary and healthy reaction from the over-development of material science and its pressure on the spiritual life of the people.

Majorities in society would compel art to evolve in certain arbitrary directions.

Science finds in art a natural evolution, throwing light on the evolution of society, and does not seek to fetter it in any way.

EDWARD GARNETT.

John Halifax, Gentleman.

Mrs. CRAIK's most famous novel, John Halifax, Gentleman, has just passed out of copyright, and Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co. have signalled the fact by producing an edition of the book, with illustrations in colour, topographical pictures, specially designed end-papers, an introduction and a bibliography. They have, indeed, accorded to it the honours of a classic; and, in a limited, temporal way, a classic it is, or was—the classic of a period, of a particular class, of a certain set of ideas. Although we are assuredly justified in calling it bad art, we shall do well to remember that nearly all art is only good or bad by comparison. If John Halifax is inferior to Jane Eyre (which preceded it by nine years), Jane Eyre, in turn, is inferior, say, to Eugénie Grandet; while, on the other hand, by the side of East Lynne—another classic of a class—John Halifax must be counted masterly. Art of a sort John Halifax decidedly possesses, for it has sincerity, a little imagination, and form—though the form is simple and naïve to the verge of crudity.

Mr. Joseph Shaylor, the writer of the somewhat indiscreet introduction, says, by way of an appreciation: "From a critical standpoint it is probable that John Halifax, Gentleman, will not be classed as one of our choicest specimens of literature, but as a novel of the imagination it will continue to hold a prominent position. Its language is always of the purest; its style characteristic and free; and is greatly to be preferred to the stilted and involved in fiction which finds so much favour in the present day. No one can doubt the sincerity of purpose with which it is written. . . ."

The pronouncement is rather obscure, but so far as we can put a meaning to it, we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Shaylor is mainly in the wrong. John Halifax will cease to hold "a prominent position" just because it is lacking in imagination and in style. Its imagination is weak, and it has no style whatever. We have read the book with mild interest, undisturbed by the memory of youthful perusals, and not a single chapter or incident stands forth above the rest; nor can we find in it any evidence that Mrs. Craik had a perception of the beauty of words. All is a smooth level of mediocre and painstaking accomplishment.

But "sincerity of purpose"—in this virtue it is indeed rich. The fine strenuousness of a profoundly religious temperament gives it character and gives it justification. In the days when John Halifax was produced, art, in the eyes of the great body of the nation, was less even than the handmaid of morals; it was the very slave and scullion. So much of art as survived was not countenanced, but rather tolerated. It held small place in the general life. It was therefore austere, not joyous; in order to retain the right of existence it had, in some sort, to pour scorn upon itself, bowing its neck beneath the foot of that neo-Puritanism which had forgotten the uses of beauty. Here lies the secret of the enormous vogue of John Halifax. (And you may estimate its success when you reflect that it was the one novel lawful to be read on Sunday.) Written sincerely, by a beautiful spirit which was in perfect accord with the spirit of the time, it flattered, with all the natural adroitness of humility, the current ideals. While its intense earnestness was a strength to the strong, it contained nothing of genius or of originality to frighten the weak, and thus it was everywhere accepted. As an example of the triumph of the commonplace, it is almost supreme. Now, of course, its day is over. It may still be popular, but long ago it has ceased to count as once it counted. Nay, it is dead. And we may lay the flower of our respect upon its grave. It deserves that tribute. Missing all other graces, it caught the grace of spirituality. Had it only been warmed at the divine fire, it might have ranked as one of the books of the century. But the fates were unkind, and its destiny limbo.

Bed-Books.

I WAS looking through Sir Walter Besant's South London last night, and came across the lines from Chancer about the Clerk of Oxenford who had at his beddes heed

Twenty booke, clad in blak or reed,
Of Aristotle and his philosophye.

And the spelling worried me. So I went to my own edition—Tyrwhitt's—to check it. Then the clerk and his books worried me. Did he read Aristotle in bed? They must have been a tough-brained generation in the fourteenth century. Maeculay's ideal scholar who could read Plato with his feet on the fender was a schoolboy to the Clerk of Oxenford who read the Nicomachean ethics between getting into bed and blowing out the candle.

Most people, I fancy, read themselves into somnolence; but we of a punier generation do not take Aristotle for a nightcap. It would be rather interesting to catalogue the contents of the bedside table of our eminent ones. What is the ideal bed-book? I have been experimenting for some years, quite unconsciously, and now there is a small library ready for me within a foot of my pillow, the fittest that have survived. A small volume of Coleridge's Table Talk, Clarissa, Tristram Shandy, and, usually on the top, Wendell Holmes's Breakfast Table. The ideal bed-book must not be exciting. Once upon a time Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde kept me awake from midnight to sunrise, which is just what a bed-book ought not to do. It should have a dispersed interest, and bear being laid down when eyelids droop. Above all, its author should be dead. If you are in the way of writing yourself and read a good book wet from the press you are annoyed to think that you did not do the same thing sooner and better. In bed you should read some one who is beyond criticism and rivalry. The ACADEMY might take a census of bed-books.

A Punster's Confessions.

JUDGING by the severity of Mr. Alden's onslaught on the pun, which was quoted in the ACADEMY last week, I gather that he himself is occasionally guilty of the play upon words. None is so ardent a bigot as the (temporarily) converted rake. A pundit who has punned it before, and will probably pun it again, is suddenly convinced of the essential inferiority of this species of wit to certain other species, and then says, in his haste, that all puns are bad. Calmer reflection will show him that this is not so. Some puns are good. The pages of Hood will furnish plenty of examples. Others are bad, but the worst puns are sometimes the most laughter-provoking. Mr. G. R. Sims has produced some excruciating specimens, as, for example, in "Faust Up-to-Date":

Mephistopheles: Along the Riviera dudes her praises sing.

Valentine: Oh, did yon Riviera hear such a thing?

which always brought down the house.

You are not quite fair to the good old "When is a door not a door" example in terming it "feeble." At any rate, its feebleness is due to age. When it was first constructed, some centuries ago, and the reply possessed the essential characteristic of unexpectedness, it was probably funny enough. Now it has so much become a part of our common heritage that when one asks, "Why is the Archbishop of Canterbury like a tin of sardines?" it is ten to one that the victim replies, "When it's a jar." Few puns will bear transplantation into cold print. Some of the essence evaporates before you can bottle it in black words on white paper, and the mot which set the table in a roar makes very flat reading. No punster, however, will willingly give up the practice of his craft at the bidding of Mr. Alden or anybody else. It furnishes too many delightful moments for that.

The luck of the punster is astounding. Here is a true story. A confirmed criminal of this kind was once travelling in a third-class carriage on the London and South-Western Railway. There was only one other occupant of the carriage, who presently, after they had fallen into conversation, remarked that he had been a great runner in his time, and had won many prizes, but that for some time he had been crippled by rheumatism. "I tried lots of things, but they were no good until someone advised me to take celery-tea. I took it, and after a few doses I could run as well as ever." The chance of bringing in "celerity" was too good to be missed, and the man who could pun took it; but the joke was entirely lost upon the man who could run, and he went placidly on with his reminiscences as if nothing had happened. This, at the time, was a little disappointing; yet the memory of it is a joy for ever.

You spoke last week of Mr. William Watson's general style at its best as "marmoreal." If Mr. Watson were to take out a poetical licence, would it be for "marmoreal bearings"?

"Household Words."

I WAS interested in looking at Dickens's Letters (writes "A. J.") to see how many titles were suggested and rejected before Household Words was hit upon. This is the list:

"The Forge."

"Home Music."

"The Hearth."

"Change."

"The Crucible."

"Time and Tide."

"The Anvil of the Time."

"Twopence."

"Charles Dickens's Own."	"English Bells."
"Seasonable Leaves."	"Weekly Bells."
"Evergreen Leaves."	"The Rocket."
"Home."	"Good Humour."

Some of these have been adopted since by other promoters of periodicals. Others, such as "Change," "Twopence," and "The Anvil of the Time," never could be used. Household Words began in the summer of 1850 with every circumstance of success. In 1859 it was incorporated with All the Year Round, and henceforward was known by that title. Subsequently, however, after the novelist's death, the two periodicals were separated and led independent lives, but in a strangely and pathetically undistinguished style. And now—where are they?

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. GASTON PARIS'S delightful and sumptuous volume, Aventures Merveilleuses de Huon de Bordeaux et de la belle Esclarmonde, rendered into a new tongue in the elegant and scholarly prose of M. Paris, comes to us as a welcome Christmas surprise. The book is superbly brought out by the famous house of Didot, with wide decorated margins and handsome illustrations. The legend treats of Charlemagne, figure of undying interest, and of Oberon, the eternal enchanter. Writing of the part the little King of the Fairies plays in this poem, M. Paris says:

Our trouvreur has given his King of Fairyland a charm all his own, whose sweet magic has conquered hearts far beyond the circle of listeners the old French poet had in his mind. Athwart the transformations of ideas, of sentiments, of customs, and of literatures, the figure of the "little wild King," with long golden locks, and his child's visage "more lovely than the midsummer sun"—exquisite mingling of force and grace, of power and kindness, of majesty and malice—has preserved all its attraction and all its freshness. After having enchanted France during four centuries, it delighted Spenser and Shakespeare, and inspired Wieland and Weber, and is still capable of entrancing the curious imagination of the poet and the simple soul of the child.

Huon, the hero, is none the less charming as a creation. He is a typical young French knight, courageous, loyal, and generous, not over wise, and desperately imprudent, whose imprudence forms the most agreeable feature of the legend. Without it he would never have killed the giant Orgueilleux, or met the lovely Esclarmonde. Without it we should have missed that delightful scene where Oberon comes at his call in a mighty rage at his disobedience, and speedily forgives him with such pretty and simple grace. Huon travels the world over, east and west, in search of adventure with far greater celerity and ease than a modern Cook's tourist, unhindered by rolling wave, enchanted land, or burning desert, and wherever he arrives he is safe to find an uncle, a cousin, or an old friend. Every Eastern potentate and tyrant turns out to be a forgotten member of his family, and neither seems in the least surprised. Imagine Prince Henry of Prussia discovering the Empress of China to be his aunt, or Prince Henry of Orleans greeting an esteemed lost uncle in Menelik.

These are the sort of surprises reserved for Huon in his wanderings in unknown, and, it must be added, perfectly unrecognisable parts. All his uncles have a most unhandsome trick of becoming Saracens, and of putting Christians to death with a ferocity unequalled by the true sons of the Faithful. Even French admirals play the grand Turk with monstrous success, and gloriously swear by Mahomet. The legend is a light and joyous one, done into modern French by M. Gaston Paris with exquisite grace, simplicity, and ease.

Before leaving M. Gaston Paris, I must insert a few lines from his fine and manly letter to M. Sorel on the recent and unfortunate league, which adds a fresh shame upon France, already overburdened:

Is it altogether wrong to accuse us of allowing an unjust preponderance to form over matter, to sentiment over reason? of nourishing prejudices to which we attach ourselves while refusing to examine their foundation? of leaning to illusions that flatter our desires, and indulging exaggerations or even lies that amuse our malignity or carass our passions? finally, of being always ready to "believe things because we wish them to be?" I think not, and I believe that those tendencies, which are dangerous, and may become fatal in part, come from the fact that the scientific spirit is not sufficiently spread among us. Above all would I say to youth, if I might hope to be heard. Love truth, wish to know it, believe in it, work, if you can, to discover it; you must know how to face it, and swear to yourselves never to falsify it, to attenuate or exaggerate it, even in an interest that might seem above it, because nothing can be higher, and the instant one betrays it even in one's innermost heart, one suffers an inward diminution, which, however slight it may be, is soon felt in the moral activity.

Grave and noble words uttered in a grave and ignoble moment. Would they might reach those to whom they are so hopelessly delivered!

Memoirs of the Moment.

MR. ST. GEORGE LANE-FOX PITT will marry Lady Edith Douglas in the early spring. Some people may not at once identify in this new Pitt a bridegroom who has won distinction in more fields than one. As a pioneer in the department of electrical engineering Mr. St. George Lane-Fox is well known in the profession; and as an investigator of psychical research he has brought a more than commonly acute intellect to bear on problems which by sensitive men can never be brusquely thrust aside. The Lane-Foxes are a family whose name in Yorkshire has been renowned hitherto rather as that of fox-hunters and of Britishers of the most uncompromising type, than as that of traffickers in spiritual things. To be good shots has been accounted more among them than to have second sight; and to ride straight to hounds an accomplishment far above the possession of hypnotic powers. The father of the bridegroom in question took the name of Pitt-Rivers on inheriting the property of his grandfather, Lord Rivers, and this is why his son, on the eve of his marriage, has added the name of Pitt to his former surname of Lane-Fox. Lady Edith Douglas, the bride, is best described as the daughter of the Marchioness of Queensberry.

THE Duke of Norfolk is going to make Arundel Castle the scene of certain mild festivities, for which since the Duchess's death he has had no heart. The first of these will be a tenants' ball on a scale of quite unusual splendour. The Duke's preferences are for a quiet life; but few people ever put duty above preference more absolutely than he; and the duty of giving pleasure to other people as an entertainer is one of which he does not intend to lose sight.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL has gone to India in the interests of the Morning Post, a paper with which, from his father's connexion with it, he must be particularly glad to be now steadily associated. Lord Randolph Churchill, it will be remembered, had the cordial support of the Morning Post in the days when he was something of a thorn in the side of his leaders. It was then the organ of Democratic Toryism, while the Standard stood out for the views associated with Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote. Apropos, I remember once a little incident that had its pretty point at the time. Sir John Pope Hennessy, whom Disraeli, in the old days, had noticed in the House, and had picked out for an important governorship, followed always with intense interest the subsequent course of affairs in Parliament. He had a pair of horses, one called Lord Randolph and the other Sir Stafford. The names had been given with design, for the pace of Lord Randolph was the quicker of the two; and Sir John used to delight himself by constantly flicking at Sir Stafford to keep him up to the mark. Thus do retired politicians continue to play at their old business in the pleasant pastimes of private life.

THE author of The Two Standards, a novel which will be published on Monday next, figures upon his title-page as "William Barry," on his binding as "The author of The New Antigone," and on the paper coverlet that protects the binding as "Dr. W. Barry." Even these three variants leave him still to be described. The Rev. William Barry is a doctor indeed—a Doctor of Divinity. Moreover, he is the priest of the Roman Catholic Mission of Dorchester—a small mission which leaves its pastor free for an immense amount of critical work, varied by a little that is creative. Dr. Barry was the author of the recent article in the Quarterly which dealt vigorously with the writings of Miss Marie Corelli and of Mr. Hall Caine. Dr. Barry, who is keenly interested in social problems, and can bring a very telling rhetoric to the treatment of them, is that rare thing in a good writer—a still better talker. He has somewhat the air of a French Abbé of the old times, and he has a thorough acquaintance with the literature of France and of Germany.

SIR HENRY IRVING is looking forward to an early trip to America to complete his convalescence.

THE Earl of Carlisle is nearing Khartum, where lies the body of his son, "the young gallant Howard," killed by mischance after the Battle of Omdurman. The pilgrimage is as melancholy a one as was ever made; but the Earl, though well advanced in years, is a man of good health and of great activity. He will bring precious relics back to Naworth Castle; and he has with him the sketching pencil and the palette which he knows how to use so well.

THOUGH last Saturday was the seventh anniversary of the death of the Duke of Clarence, the memorial is still in the studio of Mr. Gilbert. That sculptor is content with nothing less than the best, and he has given to his task care and labour which lesser men would have shirked. At present Mr. Gilbert is engaged on a series of small figures of saints which are to be the chief accessories of the memorial. For their appropriate royalty as well as for their sanctity have these heroes and heroines been chosen, in such cases as those of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, St. Nicholas of Russia, and St. Edward the Confessor. There will be some sixteen such saints; and Mr. Gilbert has commissions for several sets of them from Royalties and others most intimately concerned.

THE Prince of Wales and Lord Rosebery were among those who cared enough for Vassili Verestchagin's Napoleon paintings at the Grafton Gallery to enter their names last Saturday as subscribers for the set of reproductions.

Do husbands and wives bore each other if they visit together at country houses? The question arises when one reads and notes some of the announcements of house parties frankly published in the papers. A specimen:

Princess Henry of Pless, the Duke of Roxburghe, the Countess of Warwick, the Countess of Westmorland, Earl Cairns, Earl Cowley, Lord Annaly, Lord Elcho, Lady Norreys, Lady de Trafford, Lady Mildred Denison, the Hon. Mrs. Keppel, Sir George and Lady Ida Sitwell, Mr. and Lady Angela Forbes, the Hon. Gertrude Walsh, Mr. Laycock, Mr. A. Coventry, Mr. G. Wood, and Mr. Weigall are staying with Viscount and Viscountess Raincliffe at Blankney Hall, Lincolnshire.

The principle, of course, was admitted when husbands and wives were divided at their friends' dinner-tables: and everybody now is a logician. A change, not of place only, but of persons, too, is said by some fashionable doctors, I am told, to be the essence of a holiday. Be that as it may, so marked a departure in social habits is worth at least a remark in any memoirs of the moment.

LORD AND LADY TENNYSON, who lately dined at Windsor, were the principal guests of the Queen at the concert given at Osborne on Monday evening. They have the advantage of being the neighbours of Her Majesty in the Isle of Wight; but that proximity did not, as is sometimes supposed, bring the late Lord and Lady Tennyson into at all frequent personal association with their Sovereign. It is nearly thirty-seven years since the Queen and her Poet-Laureate first met, and at Osborne. At the same place a year later the Poet and his wife and two sons lunched. Then, after an interval of three years, Lord Tennyson was summoned to Windsor, waited in the corridor to see the Queen, and, later in the day, was taken by her over the mausoleum at Frogmore. In 1883 Lord Tennyson was again at Osborne, and ended the interview by saying: "Send for me whenever you like." Nine years later he died, and he had not seen the Queen in the interval. "Alas, I never saw him again!" the Queen exclaimed on hearing of his death.

Things Seen.

Tact.

I WAS on my way to the Reading Room of the British Museum; but the sunlight fell upon the battered memorials of Greece and Rome, and I turned aside. I was glad, for there I found that small head of Cleopatra, with the plaited hair and the great eyes—Cleopatra, born 69 B.C., died 30 B.C. It was my luncheon hour, so I stayed near her, and let the world slip by—stayed near her and the mute spoils that keep Egypt company. The spirit of the place encompassed me. Swaying to the psychic influence of the hour, I touched—I touched the very tablet whereon is written the epitaph of the Athenians who fell before the walls of Potidæa, three-and-a-half centuries before Cleopatra was born. I read the Latin words carved roughly on a slab of stone, proclaiming to all time: "Circus full," "Great shouting," "Doors closed." I spelled out the distich (a policeman had thrown his mackintosh cape across it) which some ancient mourner, anticipating Sartor, had carved upon the tomb of his dead: "Who can tell from a bare skeleton whether the person had been a Hylas or a Thersites?" I raised my eyes to the stern lineaments of dead immortals, and to that majestic figure, titled simply "Roman Poet," whose face—sad, wise, lined,—gazed over the heads of the heroes and the tales of their deeds. There my eyes stayed. I put Potidæa aside. I forgot Cleopatra. This Unknown fascinated me. "His name—his name?" I murmured. "His history—what was it?" I walked towards the attendant—the attendant whose daily work kept him among these immortals—happy lot! He did not raise his eyes as I approached. I leaned over him. "Who—" I began; then I stopped, blushing to think that I had been on the verge of interrupting him—for he was deep in Harnsworth's Magazine.

Sight.

THERE were only three of us left in the waiting-room of the great oculist, and my companions, two elderly people, evidently husband and wife, were nervous to a degree that argued almost unbearable suspense. The presence of a stranger, which in ordinary circumstances would have proved an insurmountable restraint, became as nought. He held her hand in one of his, from time to time placing his other upon it with a caressing touch.

The lady, pale and anxious-eyed, had thrown back her veil and untied her bonnet-strings, as though the atmosphere in that grave, comfortable room stifled her. At every sound she started and looked towards the door: "I almost wish I had gone in with her, she murmured, "but I couldn't bear it."

The man made no answer, but continued to stroke her hand.

Suddenly I found that I, too, was straining every nerve. Then I heard the shutting of a distant door, and the sound of footsteps coming down the thickly-carpeted passage.

My companions sprang to their feet as the door opened to admit a tall young girl with bandaged eyes and an old woman, seemingly a nurse, who carried the girl's hat and cloak.

The girl paused on the threshold, while I—gazed wondering. It would seem impossible that any face in which the eyes were covered could express such rapture as radiated from hers. She held out her hands with a gesture that was in itself a benediction, and said simply: "Dears, I can see—it is so beautiful."

He was Thinking.

DUSK was falling, and the lamps of Piccadilly feebly contending with a misty fog showed blurred grey haloes against the darkness. Hansoms and cabs flitted by comet like; horse hoofs clattered painfully on greasy wood as the red Hammersmith omnibus, nearly full, lurched past St. James's-street. Half a minute later the conductor rang, and the vehicle, slowly stopping, awaited the passenger. He came up with moderate haste, a well-dressed, elderly man, and, grasping the rail with one hand, instead of mounting the step, stood in apparent deep reflection.

"Where for, sir?" rasped the conductor, in a voice pregnant with interrogation.

The old gentleman stared, silent, serious-eyed for about five seconds, and then, in a tone of mild reproof at being disturbed—

"I was thinking," pause. "Ah-h," with a sudden rush of inspiration, "South Kensington Station."

"Brompton white 'bus, just behind." The conductor hurled the information as, with ferocious energy, he simultaneously rang the bell and stamped the foot-board.

Then, as we clattered forward, he turned to us inside, and throwing into his voice an infinity of scorn and contempt, ejaculated:

"He was thinking."

The Book Market.

Reading in America.

THE six books that are now being most read in the United States and Canada, according to the American Bookman's returns, are:

1. The Day's Work.
2. The Battle of the Strong.
3. Red Rock.
4. Adventures of François.
5. The Castle Inn.
6. Roden's Corner.

Red Rock is a novel by Mr. Thomas Nelson Page, and we describe it this week in our "Notes on Novels." The Adventures of François is Dr. Weir Mitchell's new book. Cyrano de Bergerac, although not mentioned in the above list, is very popular in the States. It is, indeed, first favourite in Albany, Atalanta, Ga., Cleveland, O., Memphis, Tenn., and Rochester, N.Y. The writers of romantic adventures seem to be as much read as ever. Indeed, the six most popular books in America are all of this class, or near it. Mr. Crockett's Red Axe and Mr. Parker's The Battle of the Strong must be added to them. In St. Paul, Minnesota, there is little room for any other kind of book. There the people are reading :

1. The Day's Work.
2. The Adventures of François.
3. Rupert of Hentzau.
4. Red Rock.
5. Red Axe.
6. Roden's Corner.

Mr. Jerome's Second Thoughts of an Idle Fellow is decidedly in request, for it figures in lists coming from six centres.

We do not notice much war literature, but the following titles are suggestive: Mr. Dooley: In Peace and War, A Yankee Volunteer, and The Gunner Aboard the Yankee. These books, however, are not more read than Tattle Tales of Cupid, or Penelope's Progress.

Here are a few typical lists :

NEW YORK.

1. The Day's Work. Kipling.
2. Red Rock. Page.
3. Adventures of François. Mitchell.
4. The Castle Inn. Weyman.
5. Battle of the Strong. Parker.
6. Aylwin. Watts-Dunton.

ALBANY, N.Y.

1. Cyrano de Bergerac. Rostand.
2. Battle of the Strong. Parker.
3. Gloria Mundi. Frederic.
4. Day's Work. Kipling.
5. Castle Inn. Weyman.
6. Roden's Corner. Merriman.

BOSTON, MASS.

1. Mr. Dooley: In Peace and in War.
2. The Day's Work. Kipling.
3. Adventures of François. Mitchell.
4. Battle of the Strong. Parker.
5. Home Life in Colonial Days. Earle.
6. Cyrano de Bergerac. Rostand.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

1. When Knighthood was in Flower. Caskoden.
2. An Idyll of the Wabash. Nicholas.
3. Battle of the Strong. Parker.
4. Red Rock. Page.
5. A Day's Work. Kipling.
6. Adventures of François. Mitchell.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

1. The Great Salt Lake Trail. Inman.
2. The Day's Work. Kipling.
3. Buccaneers and Pirates. Stockton.
4. The Castle Inn. Weyman.
5. The Adventures of François. Mitchell.

The Books of 1898.

To the Publishers' Circular the literary world is indebted for a tabular record of the book productions of another year. One learns without much surprise that the output showed a decline of 410 volumes on 1897. The Spanish-American war and political excitements generally probably account for this; for, busy as the autumn season was, it could hardly be expected to make up for the inactivity which was so noticeable throughout the spring and summer. The following table, which we quote from our contemporary, explains itself :

A Little Mistake.

SIR,—The writer of "Things Seen" in your last number would have made "The Mail Train" more interesting had he told us on what railway it was that he saw the red light on the front of the engine and the green light at the tail of the train carrying her Majesty's mail. No wonder an "absurd enthusiasm" swept over him, and that he "sprang on to the gate and bared his head" at seeing such very unusual things.—I am, &c.,

A Word for the Press Reader.

SIR,—Dealing with the question of the rights of authors and publishers in respect to corrections, a literary paragraphist remarked the other day that although "making the author responsible for anything above 25 per cent. of the charge sounds reasonable enough, it tends to throw upon authors what should properly be done by printers' readers." The innuendo contained in the latter part of this statement is unfair, I consider, to a class of literary helpers whose services, to say the least, are insufficiently recognised by authors and writers alike. Those who are in the front rank as littérateurs are always ready to acknowledge the assistance of a capable proof-reader; while a certain class of writers leave to the reader work that pertains legitimately to the author. How many dates does the reader verify? how many grammatical blunders rectify?—to say nothing of the work entailed in maintaining a consistency in the spelling of classical and historic names and localities, too frequently disregarded by the writer. A distinguished publisher not long since termed the press corrector the “author’s friend”—a designation that was re-echoed at the time by several eminent men of letters, despite the annoyance to which they are occasionally subjected when some atrocious blunder escapes detection. When, for example, one sees in the literary columns of a well-known daily “The Chambroid Nautilus” and almost the next day the title of Mr. Watts-Dunton’s novel transformed into “Asylum,” press-readers share the chagrin with writers, aware as they are that capable readers can only be secured for, if not a liberal, at any rate a fair salary.

Mr. Andrew Lang, who has had, perhaps, more dealings with printers’ readers than any other author, and has more than once been subjected to ridicule on account of their alleged remissness, has on several occasions acknowledged his indebtedness to these too frequently depreciated functionaries of the printing-office. Mr. Lang has told the story of how it came about that a line in the Tempest quoted by him in a magazine article recently appeared in this guise: “the dark backward and Shakespeare of time.” Mr. Lang was probably unaware, however, that his article was read by an inexperienced person who was not a press-reader. The word “abysm” was queried in the proof; in returning which Mr. Lang graciously gave the authority, when the incompetency and ignorance of the novice was made manifest by the perpetration of the above reading. The reader has so frequently to submit to indignities at the hands of the “printer,” invariably his mental inferior, that the recognition and sympathy of editors, writers for the press, and authors generally, should be enlisted on his behalf.—I am, &c.,

Book Reviews Reviewed.

“Wessex Poems,”
by Thomas Hardy.

THE Daily Chronicle critic deprecates any technical criticism of Mr. Hardy’s poems as “an uncalled-for pedantry.”

Readers who care more for outward form in verse than for the utterance of a human spirit will find little to their taste in Mr. Hardy’s Wessex Poems. Those, on the other hand, who are interested to see a strong and sombre character expressing itself, in an imperfectly-mastered medium, no doubt, but with marked originality and high literary power, will be fascinated by the contents of this singular book. Towards the completion of Mr. Hardy’s mental portraiture it gives invaluable aid: not less in those pieces which are “dramatic and personative” than in those which may be taken as direct utterances of a mood or thought. There is life and feeling on every page of the book; prick it, and it bleeds.

As is well known, Mr. Hardy has illustrated his poems with a number of original drawings. Two of these are reproduced on another page. The Daily Chronicle’s critic allies the poems to the drawings thus:

It is evident throughout that Mr. Hardy has not acquired perfect freedom in the use of his pencil. The attraction of his work is that of extremely able and original effort, not of thorough accomplishment. And this is exactly the case with his verse as well. Its interest, its merit, is psychological rather than technical, though there are a few pieces (as there are a few drawings) whose technical quality also is very noteworthy.

The critic of the St. James’s Gazette is more severe. He narrows the limits of Mr. Hardy’s poetry and drawings:

The only thing in the volume which really seems to us to show any proper lyrical genius is the “Stranger’s Song.” Mr. Hardy, in fine, is not a poet, but he has an odd twist in his literary composition which even in his prose gives it a poetical touch, and which when he is using a metrical form cannot desert him, and is occasionally, but by no means continuously, assisted by it. Neither is Mr. Hardy an illustrator, in spite of his illustrations. His drawings are partly those of an architect, such as he was brought up to be, and partly those of a literary man with a pencil, who can draw enough to please himself. The consequence is that these efforts are all personal impressions, sidelights on the man and the author, and very remarkable as such. Whatever they are not, they are original, and significant. No admirer of Mr. Hardy’s novels can, therefore, ignore so autobiographical a commentary.

The Outlook compares Mr. Hardy’s poems with Mr. Meredith’s:

They are interesting revelations of feeling, never of intellectuality; a singular contrast to those of Mr. Hardy’s illustrious contemporary, Mr. Meredith. Mr. Meredith glows, walks ardently through the beloved ways of nature, contemplates dazzling heights and developments of intelligence; Mr. Hardy stands still and broods. A few of the ballads are direct, dramatic, entirely successful in their way. There are a few derivative pieces—inspired by Elizabethan and also eighteenth-century sources.

Literature finds that the salt of the poems is Mr. Hardy’s “bitter humour, and the relentless handling of the irony of human fortunes.” Where these elements are lacking there is dreariness, as in the following painful picture:

The two were silent in a sunless church,
Where mildewed walls, uneven paving-stones,
And wasted carvings passed antique research,
And nothing broke the clock’s dull monotones.

Leaning against a wormy poppy-head,
So wan and worn that he could hardly stand;
For he was soon to die—he softly said,
“Tell me you love me”—holding hard her hand.

She would have given a world to breathe “Yes” truly,
So much his life seemed hanging on her mind;
And hence she lied, her heart persuaded thoroughly
’Twas worth her soul to be a moment kind.

But the sad need thereof, his nearing death
So mocked humanity that she shamed to prize
A world conditioned thus, or care for breath
When Nature such dilemmas could devise.

On these lines the critic remarks:

The piteous little scene might have come straight out of one of Mr. Hardy’s later novels. It might be some weak, unhappy, prematurely-dying Jude who pleads thus, to be thus answered. And the woman, fresh from her pious fraud, might have revolted, as here, against the scheme of things. But what could be more flat and ineffective than the four concluding lines in which her reflections are embodied! What more laboriously sought and less "inevitable" than their phrasing! There is better than this in the volume, but there is also worse; it is no unfair sample of the whole; and the whole, we fear, is conclusive as to the unfitness of this medium of expression for Mr. Hardy's genius.

The critic of the Athenæum sums up as follows:

We do not conceal our opinion that Mr. Hardy's success in poetry is of a very narrow range. He is entirely dependent for his inspiration upon this curiously intense and somewhat dismal vision of life, which is upon him almost as an obsession. Where he is not carried along by this, his movement is faltering, and his touch prosaic. But within such close limits his achievement seems to us to be considerable, and to be of a kind with which modern poetry can ill afford to dispense. There is no finish or artifice about it: the note struck is strenuous, austere, forcible; it is writing that should help to give backbone to a literature which certainly errs on the side of flabbiness. And this applies to diction as well as sentiment.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 15.

LAST week we printed a list of twenty-eight books presented by Mr. Birrell to a small public institute, and we asked our readers to supplement it with a further list of similar character and equal size. This was Mr. Birrell's choice:

Politics: Burke's Selected Works, Bright's Speeches, Bagehot's The English Constitution. Biography and History: Lockhart's Lives of Scott and Burns, Boswell's Johnson, Carlyle's Oliver Cromwell, French Revolution, Past and Present, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, and Macaulay's History. Poetry: Shakespeare, Milton, Burns, Scott, Wordsworth (Mr. Morley's edition), and The Golden Treasury of Song. Fiction: Six of Scott's novels; Don Quixote, The Pilgrim's Progress. Miscellaneous: Essays of Elia, Selections from William Hazlitt, and Hugh Miller's My Schools and Schoolmasters.

So many replies have come in this week, that the task of choosing the best has been a very arduous one. After careful collation of the various lists, we have decided that that contributed by Mr. J. B. Lamb, of 25, Ryde-street, Hull, is, all things considered, the most satisfactory, and to Mr. Lamb, therefore, a cheque for a guinea has been sent. These are his suggestions:

Politics: Stubbs's Constitutional History of England; On Liberty, John S. Mill; Life of Cobden, John Morley. Biography: Life of Charles Kingsley; Life of Charles Darwin. History: Dean Farrar's Life of St. Paul; Rise of the Dutch Republic, Motley; Short History of the English People, Green; History of Our Own Times, Justin McCarthy. Poetry: Keats; Byron; Tennyson; T. H. Ward's Selections from the English Poets; Longfellow; Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Fiction: Jane Eyre, C. Brontë; Vanity Fair, Thackeray; Westward Ho! C. Kingsley; David Copperfield, Dickens; Pickwick, Dickens; Silas Marner, G. Eliot; Lorna Doone, Blackmore; Ordeal of Richard Feverel, G. Meredith. Miscellaneous: Macaulay's Essays; Froude's Short Studies on Great Subjects; Complut Angler, Izaak Walton; Natural History of Selborne, G. White; Sesame and Lilies, Ruskin.

We may not consider this ideal, but the choice of the majority is sound and is informed by more thoughtful sympathy than has been exercised by many other competitors, who seem to have forgotten that the readers of the books were to be members of "a small public institute." Mr. Lamb, again, has remembered that the list was to be supplementary to Mr. Birrell's; other competitors have practically done Mr. Birrell's work again—that is to say, have chosen similar subjects and apportioned them to different authors. Second to Mr. Lamb's list we should put that contributed by Mr. H. T. Francis, of Caius College, Cambridge, which runs as follows:

Politics: J. S. Mill On Liberty and On Representative Government. Biography and History: Plutarch's Lives (North or Langhorne's Version); Froissart's Chronicles (Johnes Version); Napier's Peninsular War; Green's Short History of English People; Southey's Life of Nelson. Poetry: Pope's Homer; Crabbe; Percy's Reliques; Keats; Byron's Childe Harold. Fiction: De Foe's Robinson Crusoe; Le Sage's Gil Blas; Arabian Nights; Dickens's Pickwick; J. Austen's Pride and Prejudice; G. Eliot's Scenes from Clerical Life; Thackeray's Vanity Fair; Fielding's Tom Jones. Miscellaneous: Milton's Prose Works; Goldsmith's Works (Globe Edition); Cowper's Letters; Addison's Spectator; Yule's Mareo Polo; Kinglake's Eothen; Borrow's Bible in Spain; Darwin's Voyage of a Naturalist; Benvenuto Cellini's Autobiography.

If a census of all our lists were taken, the twenty-eight books mentioned most frequently would be found to differ considerably from either of the selections we have printed. This is the popular choice:

Mr. Spencer's Sociology and Smith's Wealth of Nations; Mr. Lee's Life of Shakespeare; Prescott's Mexico and Peru, Froude's Short Studies, Trevelyan's Macaulay, Grote's Greece, Southey's Life of Nelson, Green's Short History, and McCarthy's Own Times; Pope's Homer, Dryden, Tennyson, Byron, Keats, and Browning; Robinson Crusoe, Vicar of Wakefield, Pickwick, David Copperfield, Esmond, Vanity Fair, and Westward Ho! and the Spectator, De Quincey's Opium Eater, White's Selborne, and Darwin's Naturalist's Voyage.

Possibly there is among our readers some philanthropist who wishes to give five pounds' worth of books to a public institution. He might glean useful hints from this competition. We would commend to his notice, in addition to those which we have named, a few books mentioned only once or twice in these lists: Froude's English Seamen, Mahan's Life of Nelson, Frazer's Golden Bough, Jefferies' Field and Hedgerow, Barrie's Margaret Ogilvy, Thoreau's Walden, and Jusserand's English Wayfaring Life.

Competition No. 16.

Too many books already exist, and yet it is probable that most of our readers have a pet scheme for some volume that ought to be written, some work that is, they believe, really wanted. We ask competitors this week to name one or more books which do not exist, but which in their opinion should exist. A cheque for a guinea will be awarded to the author of the best suggestion. The kind of literature is left to the competitor. It may be biography, history, travel, or whatever he likes; but we make this restriction—that the book must be one it would be possible to write.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, January 24. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 107. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The "Academy" Bureau: Books in Manuscript.

An Offer to Authors.

THE Conductors of the Bureau established in connexion with the ACADEMY invite works in MS. for consideration. They have made arrangements by which a proposal for publication will be made for every MS. which, in their judgment, is sufficiently meritorious. No fee for reading and reporting, or for agency between author and publisher, will be charged unless a contract is arranged. The project was set forth more fully in our issues of October 8 and 15. Each MS. should be accompanied by an assumed name or initials, under which our criticism will be printed. The words "ACADEMY Bureau" must be marked on the wrapper, and the parcel accompanied by postage stamps for return if not accepted. It is to be distinctly understood that each MS. should contain enough to fill a volume, and that the proposal applies only to books that have not been published. The conductors of the Bureau will take every care of MSS. submitted to them, but will not be responsible for accidental loss. They cannot enter into correspondence with authors on the subject of books criticised in the Bureau, or as to completed agreements.

POACHING ADVENTURES.

BY "OUTLAW."

A proposal for publication has been made.

STREPHON DEVEREUX.

BY J. P. JAY.

Mr. Jay is a bright, clever, even subtle writer; but—, "Proboscia, the scene of the adventures of Strophon Devereux," he says, "lies north of Elysia, east of Imperia, south of Phantasmagoria, and west of Bravaria." This schoolboy-like fooling would have justified our reading no farther. It is purposeless, and not even incidentally amusing. We read on, however, and were much struck with what we found. The tale is full of duels and brawls and love-affairs, all recounted with animation, yet without effort; and some of the dialogue is unusually good. Still, it is always with difficulty that we sustain our interest. Mr. Jay has to go on with his machinery—the "Proboscians," the "Elysians," and all the other unrealities—and we are bored. It is a pity. Had the writer been content with less fantastic terminology, his novel might have been successful.

SCOTIA: A BORDER STORY.

BY "MELIORA."

We have been frequently vexed during our reading of this book. Miss Jean, an elderly spinster, who is a leading character, was subject to headache, and had her hair cut so close that "her 'crown of glory' bore a striking resemblance to a carefully pared turnip." Facetiousness of that kind is offensive and not in any other respect effectual. It would be useless for the author to explain that there really is a woman to whom the description applies. Facetiousness is not redeemed by the fact that there is rough truth in it. The love-making scenes in "Scotia" are artificial and absurd. Miss Jean and her serving-maid are good characters, amusingly dealt with; but they do not suffice to make the story presentable.

THE DESIRE OF MARNO THE KING. BY W. A. CORBETT.

This MS. is much too slight for the purposes of the ACADEMY Bureau. It is not longer than a complete story in a magazine. As it has come all the way from Winnipeg, however, we cannot dismiss it without sending to the author an expression of our good wishes. Mr. Corbett's subject does not excite us, and his style, which is modelled on that of the Bible, is rather tiresome; but he is a scholar, and has a praiseworthy respect for syntax. Our advice to him is that he should strive to find interest in modern themes and acquire a gayer habit of mind.

A NOVEL.

BY Z. Y. X.

Z. Y. X. must avoid conventionalisms of expression. Then, if he describes an unusual character, the unusualness should be harmonious and convincing. He essays the style of Stevenson; but he is not successful. Still, there are germs of better things in this novel, and with pains and self-criticism Z. Y. X. might achieve something meritorious.

ECHOES FROM ERATO.

BY HAROLD LARZEN.

Mr. Larzen writes verse; but he does not write it very well. In an address to "A Violin," his little volume opens thus:

Dear soul of empyrean heights,
Thou sweet protean voice;
We, loving, here, thy saltant flights
Of melody, rejoice
In thy mellifluous strains that flood
With dulcet chords the soul;
And wake in mortal hearts the mood
On Lethe's breast to loll.

It will be perceived from these lines that Mr. Larzen, whom we take to be a very young man, is in the stage of curiosity and wonder about things. That is promising, and we must not discourage him; but before wishing to have his feelings published he should wait until time and study have enabled him to find more articulate expression.

OLD HALL, AND OTHER POEMS.

BY "HIGHLAND."

Some of "Highland's" lyrics are bright and fresh; but his blank verse is hardly successful. Blank verse is a very exacting mode: it requires peculiar inspiration to divest it of tedium. Sometimes "Highland" is happy. For example:

Youth's golden morn of opportunity!
Lost precious hours, unprized when ye were here,
Whose very wealth made life forget your worth
And youth play wanton with the winged hours,
Spending, poor prodigal, his mint of gold
With both his hands, so anxious to be poor
That never might grow rich again.

"Highland" should avoid such phrases as "unbrageous shade," which is redundant, and "loveliness unusual"—"unusual" can never be poetry. Then, "obliter" will not do for "obliterate," even to rhyme with "bitter."

MAURICE'S FOUR SEASONS.

BY G. M. S.

This is a fairy tale. The illustrations, which are few, are exceedingly well drawn; and the tale itself is not bad as tales of the kind go. We fear, however, that we cannot do more for the author than giving her that opinion. To be published at all, the work should have been prepared for Christmas time; but it reached us only a fortnight ago.

The Singer, by A. E. M.; In Fair Llanaber, by H. W. H.; The Human Tragi-Comedy, by D. F. H.—Each of these MSS. is too short to fall within the scope of the ACADEMY Bureau.

To Correspondents.

C. F. K.—The plan which you suggest is impracticable.

L. L.—Able as it is, "A Miser's House" does not contain the elements of a popular success sufficient to warrant our arranging to have the novel published. Why not submit it to the Editor of a weekly newspaper, such as the People, circulating in the region with which the tale deals?

Announcements.

The Life and Campaigns of the Right Hon. John Manners, Marquis of Granby, and Commander-in-Chief of the British Forces, is now upon the brink of publication, and Mr. Walter Evelyn Manners has bestowed much care on the production of this memoir.

THE Hon. John Fortescue has completed his History of the British Army, and it is expected to appear before the end of the month. Messrs. Macmillan will be the publishers.

A THIRD edition of Prof. Andrew Seth's Scottish Philosophy will shortly be published by Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons. Although Prof. Seth has within the last year assumed the name of Pringle, Pattison, on succeeding to the Haining Estates in Selkirk and Roxburghshire, the old name is retained along with the new in this edition, and, to avoid confusion, the same course will be followed with the author's other books.

THE second edition of Mr. Henry Newbolt's The Island Race is nearly exhausted, and a third edition is in the press.

A NEW book, entitled In Storm and Strife, by Miss Jean Middlemass, author of A Girl in a Thousand, Hush Money, &c., will be published immediately by Messrs. Digby, Long & Co.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish later on this year an elaborate edition of The Leviathan of Thomas Hobbes, which Mr. W. G. Pogson-Smith, of St. John's College, Oxford, is editing.

AMONG the books which Messrs. Duckworth & Co. will publish during the coming Spring season will be the second edition of Spinoza: His Life and Philosophy, by Sir Frederick Pollock. This new edition of the work has been revised throughout. The purpose of the book is to put before English readers an account, complete in itself and on a fairly adequate scale, of the life and philosophy of Spinoza.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will very shortly publish in book form the articles—written in the first place for Scribner's Magazine—on The Cuban and Porto Rican Campaigns, by Richard Harding Davis. Mr. Davis has added a carefully considered summary of his impressions as war correspondent.

MR. JOHN LONG will publish at once a novel entitled Oswald Steele, by Gibbon Berkley. The plot turns on Ritualism.

THE second volume of Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co.'s series of "Mediaeval Towns" will be devoted to Rouen, and will be published very shortly. It is the work of Mr. Theodore Andrew Cook, whose two volumes upon Old Touraine are the best attestation of his ability to deal with French historical and topographical subjects.

A SERIES of articles appeared in the Saturday Review during last year, under the initial "X," in which the right of some well-known people to the arms they used was seriously questioned. These articles, which have been revised and considerably added to, will be published in a volume very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON announce for publication early in February Fields, Factories, and Workshops, a contribution to the science of economics by Prince Kropotkin.

IN PREPARATION, READY AT ONCE.

The Thrilling Story of the Adventures of Lieut. Johansen, the sole companion of
Dr. Nansen after leaving the "Fram."

350 pages, large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

WITH NEARLY 70 BEAUTIFULLY-PRINTED PHOTOGRAPHS AND OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS.

WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH.

By Lieut. H. JOHANSEN.

The success of Dr. Nansen's expedition was due in no small degree to Lieut. Johansen's wonderful powers of endurance and indomitable pluck. Johansen's story has all the interest of a romance and is essentially a popular account of the great enterprise. The adventures and vicissitudes make up a romance of real life which has never been exceeded by any previous trustworthy story of travel and adventure, and it will undoubtedly prove one of the most popular books of travel of the year.

WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH.

By Lieut. H. JOHANSEN.

* * The Publishers believe that this is the first instance on record of an important work of travel being first published at such a cheap price, most first issues of similar books being sold at 18s. or £2 2s. The format is, however, in no way inferior to these more expensive editions.

The Times says: "'Haydn's Dictionary of Dates' is the most universal Book of Reference in a moderate compass that we know of in the English language."

JUST PUBLISHED.

AN ENTIRELY NEW EDITION OF HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES AND UNIVERSAL INFORMATION.

A COMPLETE RECORD OF ALL NATIONS AND TIMES.

With especial Reference to the History and Achievements of the British Empire.

Containing the History of the World to the Autumn of 1898.

By BENJAMIN VINCENT,

Hon. Librarian of the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

Medium 8vo, cloth, 21s.; half-calf, 25s.; full or tree calf, 31s. 6d.

TWENTY-SECOND EDITION,

Revised, Corrected, and Enlarged with New and Important Matter, and thoroughly brought down to the Autumn of 1898.

Containing 1,290 pages, and considerably over 12,500
Articles, 145,000 Dates and Facts.

"The mention of dates brings us back to 'Haydn' the wonderful. 'Haydn' is far more than a mere catalogue of dates. It is a compendious history of every country and of almost everything under the sun—and on many subjects it is a veritable statistical encyclopedia. Are you interested in.....or any mortal thing you like to name? You will find out all about them in 'Haydn,' condensed and chronological, accurate and recent. In short, 'Haydn' shuns no test in its proper line, and will disappoint no reasonable expectation."—Daily Chronicle.

Messrs. WARD, LOCK & CO. are now publishing

A New and Handsome Library Edition of

THE NOVELS OF G. J. WHYTE-MELVILLE.

"THE NOVELIST, THE FATES SACER, OF FIELD SPORTS AND LONDON SOCIETY."—Athenaeum.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each Volume.

The late G. J. Whyte-Melville, uniting, as he did, the qualities of poet, novelist, sportsman, and leader of society, has long been acknowledged to stand above rivalry when dealing with sport and the romance of old. Although the sale of his works has always been large, the Publishers feel that the time has now arrived to issue an edition more worthy of his fame, and have therefore pleasure in announcing a monthly issue of his novels. Each volume will be illustrated by front-rank artists.

This Series will be well printed from type specially cast, on Dickinson's best antique paper, and neatly and handsomely bound in cloth gilt, with design by A. A. Turbayne.

JUST READY.

KATERFELTO. Illustrated by Lucy E. Kemp-Welch.

"The story of 'Katerfelto' is already well known to many of my readers, but even those will be glad to have it in so beautiful an edition. Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.'s edition is a marvellous three-and-sixpence worth; well printed, well bound, and well illustrated. 'Katerfelto' is indeed a delightful romance."—Mr. CLYMENT K. SHORTER in the Sketch.

CERISE. Illustrated by G. P. Jacob-Hood.

"'Cerise' ranks as one of the author's best books. It has long enjoyed great popularity, and in this fine Library Edition the story will, no doubt, secure fresh readers in abundance. No better set of these favorite novels could be desired, binding, type, paper, and pictures all being of the best."—Nottingham Guardian.

A STUDY OF WAGNER.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

This book is an attempt to study Wagner from every standpoint suggested by his work—musical, poetical, and literary. Its object is to find a tertium quid between the Wagnerians and the anti-Wagnerians—to see the man, in fact, as he really was. An attempt is made to arrive at a general psychological estimate of him by examining his utterances on non-musical subjects, and co-ordinating the results thus obtained with those given by the study of him as musician and poet.

The Literary Week.

IN noting, last week, the fact that sixpenny editions of The Forest Lovers and With Kitchener to Khartum are already promised, we remarked: "The publisher who first issues a new book by a popular author at a shilling, or even two shillings, will reap the reward of his enterprise." We did not then know that Messrs. Methuen contemplate an interesting experiment in publishing. They are about to issue, at sixpence, under the general title of "Methuen's Library of Fiction," new stories by popular authors. The first book thus published will be a new novel by Mr. E. W. Hornung. Mr. Robert Barr and Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne will follow, and later will be published books by Mr. Baring Gould and others.

THE importance of this scheme, and its possible far-reaching consequences, will be appreciated at once. The stories about to be issued at sixpence are not short stories; they are new novels of the usual six-shilling length. But Messrs. Methuen have not the slightest intention of undermining the six-shilling novel, a form of literature in which their own commercial interest is large. The six-shilling novel has been overdone, and a decline in its production has already set in; nevertheless, for years to come it must be the standard product in fiction. Indeed, the position of the six-shilling novel will be strengthened if the present disposition to limit its production and raise its quality continues.

THERE remain, however, the growing demand for cheap books, and the fact that large circulations are fascinating to publishers and authors. Hence Messrs. Methuen's experiment. They have asked a number of authors whose novels sell well at six shillings to allow some of their stories to appear, in the first instance, at sixpence. At sixpence, it is hoped, these stories will enjoy large and speedy sales. Then, and only then, they will be issued in more expensive form—say, at 3s. 6d. Thus the usual process, which has been to issue a book first at six shillings and then at a popular price, is about to be reversed. Obviously, stories appearing in this form will appeal to the readers of magazines, and they will undoubtedly be sold by newsagents. Thus the author will reap an extra profit, and will reach a new audience. However, the experiment is frankly an experiment, and can only be justified by success.

AMONG the books which Mr. Meredith has just presented to the Dorking Literary Institute are two of his own novels—Rhoda Fleming and Vittoria.

AMONG the present popularity of Burne-Jones, a learned and sincere critic of painting dropped, the other day, this little remark: "Indiscriminate praise of Burne-Jones is now a sign of the higher vulgarianism."

IN a letter to the Daily Chronicle on Wednesday, Mr. George Moore said: "The public was, is, and always will be, a filthy cur, feeding upon offal, which the duty of every artist is to kick in the ribs every time the brute crosses his path." We presume that henceforth Mr. Moore will issue his books "for private circulation only."

"It is dead, and its destiny is limbo." Such was the verdict pronounced by our contributor, "E. A. B.," last week, on John Halifax, Gentleman. "E. A. B." did not mean that this novel is commercially dead. That it is commercially alive is the fact. Messrs. Hurst & Blackett write: "It is not for us to forecast the future of John Halifax, Gentleman, but we can say something, with authority, about its immediate past. We find, on consulting our ledgers, that we sold last year of the various editions we have in circulation 24,190 copies of John Halifax. From this fact we argue that, if the story is, as 'E. A. B.' so confidently says, 'dead,' it is, nevertheless, a tolerably vigorous and lively corpse."

TO this our contributor replies: "I accept Messrs. Hurst & Blackett's communication with proper humility. The figures which they give are astounding, and reflect upon them, as men of business, the highest credit. I cannot but yield before that macabre battalion of 24,190 corpses. With gladness I adopt their definition: 'a tolerably vigorous and lively corpse.' So long as they will allow me to select the substantive, they may have their choice of adjectives. Of course, I ought to have been more explicit—this age is so literal. When I asserted that John Halifax was dead, when I grew sentimental and laid a flower on its grave, I meant merely that it had ceased to exist as a literary force."

WE seem to have been murderously given last week, for a writer in "The Contributors' Playground"—after giving a list of the numerous titles which were suggested and rejected by Charles Dickens before Household Words was hit upon—concluded with a sentence which has been interpreted as a statement that Household Words is no longer appearing. The fact is that Household Words is very much alive, and a copy of the February monthly part which lies before us is full of entertaining stories and articles.

IN the new number of the North American Review Mr. Gosse surveys and praises that new "Literature of Action" of which we have had so many examples in late years. Mr. Gosse sees a real connexion between the "besieged attitude of Great Britain among the European nations," and the literary movement which has given us so many robust tales of adventure and narratives of battle, from Treasure Island down to Chitral: The Story of a Minor Siege. Between these works come the romances of Mr. Haggard and the tales and poems of Mr. Kipling. Mr. Haggard did the rough work, he awakened "a taste for violent and sanguinary action." Mr. Kipling's career has been "one unflagging appeal to the fighting instincts of the race," with this reservation, that "he does not provoke war, or underestimate its afflictions, but he preaches for ever in our ears, 'Be ready!'" For Sir George Robertson's Chitral, the last example of the school, Mr. Gosse has the warmest praise. Of Robertson's young officers he remarks: "These British officers of his, with their irresistible pluck and energy merely dormant, ready to break out into a blaze at a moment's notice, are what Mr. Kipling gazes at fondly, and murmurs, 'Mine own people!'"

IN the volume of Letters of Walter Savage Landor just published—which we shall review later—the kindlier side of Landor's nature is pleasantly revealed. Enough has been written about his harsher qualities. But in these letters to Miss Rose Paynter (now Lady Rose C. Graves-Sawle) we find Landor writing to one who understood him well. Lady Graves-Sawle has handed to Mr. Stephen Wheeler, who edits the volume, letters which she received from Landor during more than a quarter of a century; and Mr. Wheeler does well to print the graceful letter in which Lady Graves-Sawle committed them to him and to the public. She writes: "In our happy family circle at Bath Mr. Landor found a rest for his impatient spirit; and the welcome always accorded to him there soothed and cheered his solitary life, and was repaid by the outpouring of his enthusiastic and poetic nature." Lady Graves-Sawle is the niece of the Rose Aylmer of Landor's boyish romance.

HOLLAND'S Suetonius, forming Volumes XXI. and XXII. of Mr. William Ernest Henley's Tudor Translations, will be delivered to subscribers in the course of the next few days. The dedication is to Mr. Cecil Rhodes.

THE death is announced of Mrs. George Cupples at Mossgiel, near Dunedin, New Zealand. She was the widow of the late Mr. George Cupples, who was one of the old Blackwood school of writers. Mrs. Cupples's own contributions to literature were mainly for the young, and they were numerous. Many will remember her book, Tappy's Chicks; or, Links between Nature and Human Nature. It was written at the request of Mr. George Macdonald, in whose magazine, Good Words for the Young, the matter as a collection first appeared.

THE wailing cry of the Omarite seeking a cheap edition of FitzGerald's transfusion still reaches us, though from afar. A New York devotee wishes to see the poem included in the "Golden Treasury" series. No doubt it could be suitably added to that collection of standard literature. By the way, an American magazine recently printed FitzGerald's version in extenso.

THE Puritan is the newest sixpenny magazine, and it is amusing to see how promptly the editor goes to work to prove that Puritans are not puritanical, and that a magazine with such a title may embrace the whole world. We open the Puritan, and see portraits of Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. George Macdonald, Mr. Barrie, Mr. Crockett, Miss Adeline Sergeant, Mr. Kipling, Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler, Mr. Quiller-Couch, Mr. Silas K. Hocking, Lord Lister, and others. All Puritans, or sons or daughters of Puritans! The idea that a Puritan is a gloomy kill-joy is scouted by the editor on flat evidence. Did not the Lancashire Puritans play billiards and hunt? Was not Colonel Hutchinson passionately fond of hawking? And had not John Owen "a weakness for unclerical dress of rather a showy sort"? Go to, and be merry, the editor seems to exclaim, and immediately becomes serious, saying: "Our care must be to . . . fight for God, and for that righteousness which alone 'exalteth a nation.'" We are just a little puzzled by the Puritan, but we wish it success.

THE New York Tribune reviews in its issue of the 15th inst. the volume of Songs and Meditations which Mr. Maurice Hewlett put forth through Messrs. Constable three years ago. Clearly the romancist has recommended the poet. The gulls are now on the Thames, and the Tribune quotes a sonnet by Mr. Hewlett on this theme.

WHEN a Socialist has split his quill from nib to feather-tip in trying to prove the identity of meum and tuum, he usually selects another pen and, for a space, writes exuberantly and well about pictures, or street-life, or tom-tits, or music, throwing in a good deal of autobiography out of sheer good spirits. In this manner Mr. Harry Lowerison—one of the gay, sad, mad writers of the Clarion—has produced a little book called In England Now. It is a series of short records of holiday rambles taken by the author with his wife and child, whose portraits are engagingly included as a frontispiece. The ensuing chapters take us to Highgate, the Surrey hills, the New Forest, Southend, Chingford, and elsewhere. To all who like keen and loving observations of birds and water-mice, mingled with references to "bat-eyed and materialistic priests," and rich men who have lost their own souls, we commend these light-hearted pages. But we do not commend Mr. Lowerison for ridiculing church-goers and praising Nell Gwynn in one irresponsible breath. "Nell was not respectable. She was too warm-hearted, too passionate, too human to be respectable." This also is cant.

CONTINUING our series of photographs of French writers in their studios, we give this week a photograph of JULES LEMAITRE.

From a Photograph by Dornoch et Cie, Paris.

M. Jules Lemaitre at his desk. The question whether an author smokes is often asked; in this case it is forestalled by the pipe in the eminent critic's hand.

THE choice of words and phrases in drawing up a document of a formal and businesslike character is a matter which often taxes the most practised writer. Men who will write an essay with ease are at sea when asked to draft a circular. Macaulay could do both, and his skill in drawing up minutes was remarkable. An amusing story shows that the members of the recent Education Commission did not draft their report without difficulty. Canon Lyttelton relates that he and his fellow-workers discussed each phrase in order to be sure that it expressed the exact meaning the Commission intended. The phrase, "the teachers of England, a highly-trained and intelligent set of men," was read out. Some members objected to the adjectives, but the writer defended them, and the dispute was becoming warm when Prof. Jebb quietly suggested that the words would apply equally well to elephants. The phrase did not survive that.

IN our issue of December 17 we described the method which the American publishers of Mr. Ollivant's story, Owd Bob (which across the Atlantic is called Bob, Son of Battle), have adopted for pushing that book. Their plan is to send it on approval to anyone making application.

On this we remarked: "The method is yet another cut at the retail trade." The letter from the Doubleday and MacLure Company, the publishers in question, which we print in our Correspondence column, is a reply to this remark. But it also reveals the fact that a new system of distributing books has been inaugurated in the States. Not only is Bob, Son of Battle, sent out on approval, but all other books published by the firm. The firm still contend that no attack is made on the retail trade, inasmuch as the system has been started for the benefit of "book-lovers who are not within the reach of bookstores."

BUT how can the area of such operations be limited to the village? Will not the town book-lover also want books on approval direct from the publisher? He will, and does. For with their letter of defence Messrs. Doubleday & MacLure enclose an advertisement, which says: "The convenience of such facilities for book buying seems, however, to be almost as keenly appreciated by those in the great centres of population [where, of course, booksellers are plentiful] as by the people far from bookstores." Thus, like the cup in Benjamin's sack, this naïve admission proves our charge. But our remark was only a remark: we do not propose to fight the battles of American booksellers. Rather we are moved to reflection when we observe—as a proof of the fluidity and confusion of the Anglo-Saxon book markets—that in America it is proposed to do without booksellers, and that in England it is proposed to do without publishers. To each nation its Jonah.

By the way, Mr. Ollivant, the author of Owd Bob, which, as our recent review showed, sets forth the virtues of a sheep-dog, is the son of an artillery officer, and twenty-five years of age. His military career had scarcely begun

MR. ALFRED OLLIVANT.

when it was ended by injuries received in a fall from a horse. Compelled by the sad hopelessness of his case to abandon all idea of the Army, Mr. Ollivant began writing in a spinal chair. He was moved to write by Mr. R. L. Stevenson's remark concerning a collic: "Alas! he was that foulest criminal under trust—a sheep-eater." Mr. Ollivant knew something about collies, and he tried a short story of a sheep-murder. From this effort Owd Bob—perhaps the best dog-book story that has been written since Rab and His Friends—took shape.

It is not long since, with blanched cheeks and sympathetic thoughts, we chronicled the fall of one American literary paper after another. But now that the War is over—Wall-street is busy almost past record—we shall not be surprised if the mails bring us surprise packets. We have just received a copy of In Lantern-Land from Hartford, Connecticut. It is political and literary and ten cents. Its appearance is like the Chap-Book remembered in dreams. Why In Lantern-Land? The answer is in this quotation from Rabelais: "You who presume to move this way, get a good lantern lest you stray." "We took especial care of that," cried Pantagruel, "for there is not a better or more divine lantern than ours in all Lantern-Land." Well, well, we shall see. Already In Lantern-Land is a well-printed, well-written little paper not without its points. As it goes on it will learn something about England, and not suppose that the uniform in which Prof. Max Müller is depicted in his Auld Lang Syne book is "that of the English Royal Academy."

To Mrs. Ritchie's biographical edition of Thackeray is now added The Virginians. This novel grew out of Thackeray's American experiences, which he found pleasant, and particularly out of his second visit to the States in 1855. But the immediate impulse to put the tale on paper came from his failure in 1857 to win the seat in Parliament for Oxford. Beaten at the poll, Thackeray calmly wrote: "I will retire and take my place with my pen and ink at my desk." Thackeray was then at the height of his fame and income; his meddling with politics was a divagation, almost a freak. The first number of The Virginians (the last of his novels published to appear in monthly parts and the last that he illustrated himself) appeared in November, 1857.

Mrs. RITCHIE's introductory notes to the volume are particularly interesting, for few people think of Thackeray issuing a manifesto to the British voter, or lecturing his way up the Mississippi. In his letters Thackeray jotted down some lively notes on America. He had this to say about its climate:

In both visits to America I have found the effects of the air the same. I have a difficulty in forming the letters as I write them down on the page in answering questions, in finding the most simple words to form the answers. A gentleman asked me how long I had been in New York. I hesitated, and then said a week. I had arrived the day before. I hardly know what is said. Am thinking of something else, nothing definite, with an irrepressible longing to be in motion. I sleep three hours less than in England, making up, however, with a heavy long sleep every fourth night or so. . . . There is some electric influence in the sun and air here which we don't experience on our side of the globe: people can't sit still, people can't ruminate over their dinners, dawdle in their studies; they must keep moving. I want to dash into the street now.

In any batch of Thackeray's letters we expect to find playful-weary moralisings on the vanity of all things. Thus, in 1858, he wrote to his friend, Dr. John Brown:

I send no condolences about the departure of your good old father. He was ready, I suppose, and his passport made out for the journey. Next comes our little turn to pack up and depart. To stay is well enough, but shall we be very sorry to go? What more is there in life that we haven't tried? What that we have tried is so very much worth repetition or endurance? I have just come from a beefsteak and potatoes (one franc), a bottle of claret (five francs), both excellent of their kind, but we can part from them without a very sore pang, and note that we shall get no greater pleasure than these from this time to the end of our days. What is a greater pleasure? Gratified ambition, accumulation of money—what? Fruition of some sort of desire, perhaps? When one is twenty, yes; but at forty-seven!

Contrast.

IN bygone spruigs, when skies were blue
And earth was green, new-washed with rain,
My heart still leaped at thought of you,
While heaven and earth were new again.
Now skies are gray and earth is brown,
And in the distance moans the sea,
While sullenly the rain comes down
And blots out heaven and earth for me.

THE coinages of words which we published in our Literary Competition column a fortnight ago have aroused considerable interest. "Penandincompoop" (a stupid writer) and "blue-domer" (one who says he can worship his Creator better under the blue dome of heaven than at church) are particularly admired. A contemporary makes the rather ghastly suggestion that "filicide" and "filiaicide" are needed to go with patricide, matricide, and sororicide (a dictionary word, it seems); but we feel indifferent to the multiplication of such words. We may point out, however, that there is an opportunity for writers to employ some of our readers' coinages, and so, in all probability, secure their inclusion in Dr. Murray's great dictionary.

LITERARY coincidences (they sometimes go by a harsher name) are favourite game with a good many literary huntsmen. A correspondent has discovered a resemblance, which is certainly unexpected and curious, between writings of Lord Macaulay and Edgar Allan Poe. The question indicated is: Had Macaulay when he wrote his Essay on Warren Hastings read Edgar Allan Poe's Tale of the Rugged Mountains? and the reason for asking this is to be found in the following comparison:

EDGAR ALLAN POE.

(From A Tale of the Rugged Mountains.)

P. 484, Minerva Library.

On every hand was a wilderness of balconies, of verandas, of minarets, of shrines and fantastically carved oriels. . . . Besides these things were seen on all sides banners and palanquins, litters with stately dames close-veiled, elephants gorgeously caparisoned, idols grotesquely hewn, drums, banners and gongs, spears, silver and gilded maces. And amid the crowd and the clamour and the general intricacy and confusion—amid the million of black and yellow men, turbaned and robed and of flowing beard, there roamed a countless multitude of holy filleted bulls, while vast legions of the filthy but sacred ape clambered chattering and shrieking about the cornices of the mosques or clung to the minarets and oriels.

Beyond the limits of the city arose in frequent and majestic groups the palm and the cocoa, with other gigantic and weird trees of vast age; and here and there might be seen a field of rice, the thatched hut of a peasant, a tank, a stray temple, a gipsy camp, or a solitary graceful maiden taking her way with a pitcher upon her head to the banks of the magnificent river.

Our correspondent adds: "The comparison is even closer as reference to pages given will show."

LORD MACAULAY.

It was commonly believed that half a million of human beings was crowded into that labyrinth of lofty alleys, rich with shrines and minarets and balconies and carved oriels, to which the sacred apes clung by hundreds. The traveller could scarcely make his way through the press of holy mendicants and not less holy bulls.

The burning sun, the strange vegetation of the palm and the cocoa tree, the rice-field, the tank, the huge trees, older than the Mogul empire, under which the village crowds assemble, the thatched roof of the peasant's hut . . . the drums, the banners and gaudy idols, the devotees swinging in the air, the graceful maiden with her pitcher on her head descending the steps to the river side, &c.

MR. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, AS SEEN BY MR. MAX BEERBOHM.

MR. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM, whose book, Mogreb-el Aeksa, we shall review next week, is one of the most active, versatile, and alert of men. Our caricaturist's portrait of him gives more than a hint of these qualities.

APROPPOS the recent discussion as to the condition of Joanna Baillie's grave, it is interesting to note that a handsome monument has just been erected to her memory at Bothwell. The old historic parish church of Bothwell has recently been restored, and in connexion with the restoration several blocks of houses have been removed and the ground thus cleared has been planted with trees, shrubs and flowers. The monument to Joanna Baillie, who, it may be remembered, was born in the manse of Bothwell, has been placed in the centre of this ground. The monument is sixteen feet in height; and its distinctive features are the mosaics in the four panels. On the side fronting the street is a portrait of Joanna Baillie; on another side is a reproduction of Horatio McCulloch's painting of Bothwell Castle; on the third is a representation of the children of Bothwell in the early days of the poetess; and on the fourth the apple and plum trees of the valley of the Clyde. Under the panels are appropriate inscriptions, also in mosaics. These include extracts from her writings recalling her early days in Bothwell.

Bibliographical.

I AM interested in the statement that an Oxford Diary of the late Lewis Carroll is being edited for the press by Miss Isa Bowman. We may fairly assume that this is the Miss Isa Bowman who played the part of Alice in the dramatised "Alice in Wonderland," when that piece was revived at the Globe Theatre in 1888-9, and who enacted the rôle of a fairy in the dramatised "Rose and the Ring" in 1890-1. Miss Bowman is a clever young actress and vocalist, and when I last saw her she was playing the "juvenile lead" with Mr. Arthur Roberts in one of that gentleman's latest "musical comedies"—"Dandy Dan," I think it was. Readers of Mr. Collingwood's Life of Lewis Carroll are aware that there are a good many references to Miss Bowman and her sisters in the latter part of the book. The youthful Isa, it seems, was the only young lady Lewis Carroll could tolerate for more than a fortnight. Her younger sister Eupsie's title to honour is that she was the Dormouse in "Alice" in 1888-9.

I wonder if the author of the article in the Quarterly on "Some Women Poets" would be disposed to come down from the Olympian heights and give me a little information? I want to be told something about two of the writers he refers to at the close of his paper—about "Isa Blagden," and about "L. N. Little." I confess to recognising the name of the former lady, but (alas! that I should have to say so) I attach no idea to it. Of the latter lady I know neither the name nor the work. Is she the Lizzie M. Little who, in 1884, published a volume called Persephone, and Other Poems? And is she the L. M. Little who, in 1897, published a book entitled Wild Myrtle? To be obliged to confess ignorance in these matters is humiliating; but only thus can knowledge be obtained.

Moreover, there is another point on which I yearn for instruction. I want someone to tell me the literary history of the Miss (or Mrs.) Florence Bright who has collaborated with Robert Macsway in The Vision Splendid. Can she be identical with the "Mrs. Augustus Bright" who has some reputation as a playwright? To this lady I find ascribed four (there may be more) plays, entitled "Not False, but Fickle," "Noblesse Oblige," "Bracken Hollow," and "Dane's Dyke," all produced between 1878 and 1881. On the whole, however, I am inclined to attribute the part-authorship of The Vision Splendid to a young actress named Florence Bright, whom I saw ten years and more ago in a little piece called "Caught Out," which she had adapted from a German original.

The promised biography of the second Duke of Buckingham, who has a place in literature as the author of The Rehearsal, will be welcome. Though this George Villiers was a "bounder" of the deepest dye, he, nevertheless, had a career of great variety, and the story of his successive ups-and-downs must needs be interesting. Perhaps Lady Burghelere, his biographer, will be able to tell us whether Buckingham really did write the farce called "The Battle of Sedgemoor" which tradition attributes to him.

Of the late Lord de Tabley, it appears, we are to have only a biographical sketch, from the pen of Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff. I should have thought there would have been material for something fuller. The deceased poet laboured, I fancy, under a disadvantage in being known to the public successively as "William Lancaster" (the pseudonym under which he published at least three volumes of verse), the Hon. J. Leicester Warren, and Lord de Tabley. The British nation is easily befogged over people—such as poets—in whom it takes no particular pleasure or pride; and no sooner had it got accustomed somewhat to "Leicester Warren" than "Lord de Tabley" came along to complete its bewilderment. Late in life the poet secured some measure of recognition; but his vogue is not likely to spread or to last long.

Why resuscitate (or attempt to resuscitate) in the thousandth number of Blackwood some of the original participants in the "Noctes Ambrosianæ"? Why not have modernised the original idea, and brought to the Ambrosian board certain of the literati of to-day? The men of the old "Noctes" have no attraction for the present generation; they cannot be galvanised into life. The thousandth Blackwood, to be up-to-date, should have exploited the present contributors to "Maga."

Mr. A. L. Salmon, whose West Country Ballads and Verses we are taught to look for, is not wholly new as a bard. He was guilty, a little more than three years ago, of Songs of a Heart's Surrender, and Other Verse, which had the distinction of being published at the price of two shillings only. There's modesty for you!

The new memoir of James and Horace Smith, of which I said something some weeks ago, will be published, probably next month, by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett. This is as it should be, for I believe I am correct in saying that many of Horace Smith's novels, including Brambletye House, were issued by Messrs. Hurst & Blackett's immediate predecessor at 13, Great Marlborough-street—Henry Colburn. Moreover, was it not Henry Colburn who published James Smith's Miscellanies, for which Horace wrote a brief memoir of his brother?

I see that the forthcoming memoir of Francis Turner Palgrave is announced by the publishers as The Life of the Editor of the "Golden Treasury." I am not sure that Mr. Palgrave would have liked this, could he have foreseen it. He had some pretensions to be regarded as a poet—look at his Idylls and Songs (1854), his Hymns (1867), his Lyrical Poems (1871), his Amenophis (1892), and so forth. He had also some pretensions to be regarded as a critic of literature—was he not Professor of Poetry at Oxford? He had some pretensions to be regarded as a critic of art. Yet, after all this varied and strenuous endeavour, his very own publisher elects to describe him as "Editor of the Golden Treasury." The Treasury has been very popular in its day, but its limitations are beginning to be recognised. And the "second series" of it—what is to be said of that "second series"?

There seems to be a certain lack of invention among authors in the matter of titles. Somebody has just brought out a play called—a little abruptly—"Intruders." Well, it was only the other day that Mrs. Walford christened one of her stories "The Intruders." And then there is that little tragedy of Maeterlinck's, "L'Intruse." Really, the iteration becomes—tiresome.

Reviews.

New Verse.

THE perusal of Mr. Buchanan's latest volume, The New Rome (Scott), from first page to last, leaves some such impression as a mass meeting in Hyde Park—for the poet writes (as was said of another) at the top of his voice, and he is usually angry. We believe his anger to be mainly just, we believe his impulses to be mainly right; but he has certainly lost the art of enchainning attention. Poetry that is to reform the world must first allure and then persuade. Mr. Buchanan flings his songs at us, caring apparently nothing for form. The begetter of the book, he tells us, was Mr. Herbert Spencer, who wrote to him: "There is an immensity of matter calling for strong denunciation and display of white-hot anger, and I think you are well capable of dealing with it. More especially, I want someone who has the ability, with sufficient intensity of feeling, to denounce the miserable hypocrisy of our religious world, with its pretended observances of Christian principles side by side with the abominations which it habitually assists and countenances." Mr. Buchanan, however, gave up the idea of a connected satire, and produced this volume of distinct but, he holds, congruous lyrics and ballads. We quote, from the section called "In the Library," a poem to Mr. Hardy:

THE SAD SHEPHERD.

Thy song is piteous now that once was glad,
The merry uplands hear thy voice no more—
Thro' frozen forest ways, O shepherd sad,
Thou wanderest, while wintry tempests roar;
And in thine arms—aye me!—thou claspest tight
A wounded Lamb that bleateth in the cold,
Warming it in thy breast, while thro' the night
Thou strugglest, fain to bear it to the fold!
Shepherd, God bless thy task, and keep thee strong
To help poor lambs that else might die astray!
Thy midnight cry is holier than the song
The summer uplands heard at dawn of day!

We do not quite gather for what Mr. Hardy is commended. Not even at the dawn of his day was he a particularly cheery writer, nor does he, we imagine, aim now at helpfulness. (In another poem, we might add, Mr. Buchanan writes: "Tom Hardy, blow the clouds apart With sounds of rustic fives and tabors!") Mr. Buchanan also addresses Mr. Bernard Shaw, and bids his work "God-speed." But for Mr. W. D. Howells and Mr. Henry James, Tolstoi and Ibsen, he has only hard knocks. Altogether, there is a vast deal of undisciplined vigour in this book, but the verses have been thrown together with the utmost recklessness and no suggestion of revision. Many of the pieces are mere rhymed journalism.

MR. UNWIN'S "Cameo" series, in which Mr. Watson's Wordsworth's Grave and other noticeable works were first published, has just entered upon a new life. The first volume issued therein is The Soul's Departure, by Mr. Edward Willmore, a slender collection of short poems. That which gives the title to the book is quite the most remarkable. In unrhymed and, to our ear, unmetrical lines of sometimes almost exasperating brevity, the poet relates a deathbed dialogue between a body and a soul. Immediately on release the soul perceives how lacking it has been in fine impulses and noble deeds, and it craves from the body a few hours more of life in which to make some reparation. The poet's technique is certainly crude, but he has informed this tragic and piteous little scene with real force and pathos. It is impossible to read it and not be impressed. Nothing else in the book is so striking. Mr. Willmore has thoughts, but he evidently rhymes with difficulty and is not by nature a lyricist. We recommend him to spend more pains on form.

LESS complex and more robust are Mr. F. A. Homfray's Idyls of Thought and Lyriical Pieces (Allen). Mr. Homfray's thoughts are not new, but they are sound, and are clearly presented. He loves the open air, and sings of his love brightly. Here is a less cheerful note:

BY A GRAVE.

Lilies in the valley,
Harebells on the hill,
And in the meadow buttercups,
And wild-rose by the rill;
But only daisies in the turf,
Where my love lies still.
Overhead the heaven,
Where the skylarks soar,
And round about, the waving boughs
As sunny as before;
But the sun that lit this life for me
Is set for evermore.

Altogether, a fresh and healthy little book.

AN author who calls his effusions Ventures in Verse (Methuen) has plumbed modesty. He can go no farther without lapsing into abuse of his own wares. Mr. James Williams, whose book is so entitled, we like better than many of our poets whose volumes have a more pretentious name. He divides himself between sonnets and romantic Scandinavian ballads, and both are above ordinary merit. Here is a quotation from the sonnet section:

OLD ENGLISH POETRY.

There was no age when England's voice was dumb
Amid the chorus paramount in song,
They do our fathers not a little wrong
Who deem them nought but fierce and quarrelsome.
Yea, even as the honey-bees will hum
Round arid saxifrage in ardent throng,
So out of words and grammar harsh and strong
Men beat out Beowulf and the Ormulum.
Scorn not their writing; seek in them to find Heart-poetry that strove in vain for phrase,
And look with kindly eye on Layamon.
They sowed their seed beside the stony ways,
It is the centuries that reap and bind,
Maybe that Caedmon gave us Tennyson.

This is like the condensed lecture of a professor of English literature. It is a very fair sonnet too. There is no harm in Mr. Williams continuing to be venturesome in verse.

IN Love Triumphant (Innes), by Annie Matheson, the irregular ode is in full swing once more. The subjects are Mr. Gladstone, Robert Browning, and the Diamond Jubilee, and the poet revels in the license extended to her by—as experimentalists in such a medium fondly believe—Pindar. Gladstonians should certainly obtain and treasure this volume, for it contains the fullest panegyric of the statesman that we have yet met with. Other verses deal with social subjects, always from the standpoint of the passionate friend of liberty, progress, and Christianity. The author states that the publishers “generously held out a hand” for this book. It is not their usual attitude with minor verse.

MR. G. HUNT JACKSON, the author of The Demon of the Wind (Long), also seeks his subjects in the life of to-day. He lights, for example, upon an anecdote in an article on R. L. Stevenson (“He was about to summon his young native servant for refreshments, when the door opened and the boy appeared with a tray containing cigarettes and coffee. His master, addressing him in the native tongue, said: ‘Great is your forethought’; when the boy corrected him, saying ‘Great is the love!’”), and gives us a little sermon upon it. He hymns Gladstone (“He moved among the forest trees,” and so forth), and Carlyle (“A breezy soul was thine!”), and a remark of Burne-Jones is the motive of another set of verses. A genuine and kindly, although undistinguished, book.

THERE are some hard things in the Rev. T. E. Bridgett’s Sonnets and Epigrams on Sacred Subjects (Burns & Oates). Darwin, for example, once dared, in a private letter, to doubt a future life. The poet comments upon his hesitancy in four scathing epigrams, of which this is one:

Future life is but a guess,
The Bible all a lie;
Sir, I wish you happiness:
Study worms and die.

Again, Renan wrote that he no longer prayed. Thus the epigrammatist:

To Renan this was once as noonday bright;
He ceased to pray, and God withdrew His light.
Then would he strike his matches in the dark,
Enjoy the stench, and glory in the spark.

We cannot but admire a poet so vehemently convinced of the veracity of his own beliefs, but any attack on so sincere a worker for truth as Darwin is painful.

THIS is a passage from the story of “Saint John and the Little Worm” in Legends of the Saints (Kegan Paul), by the Rev. G. R. Woodward:

The saint was musing thus that tide,
When he a worm beneath him spied,
So gray and small that good Saint John
Had well-nigh set his foot thereon.
He picked her up from where she lay.

We never expected to live to hear a worm called “she.” This is a quaint and simple little book, which would make pleasant reading aloud for a child: a versified companion to Mr. Canton’s Child’s Book of Saints.

THE fact that Maud Holland (Maud Walpole) reprints in her modestly entitled little book—Verses (Arnold)—certain poems from the Spectator, the National Review, and Literature indicates that she has something to say. We like her ballad of Margaret Catchpole, the Suffolk girl who was transported for horse-stealing, and advise reciters to look to it. In a different vein is this dirge:

‘His hound may tarry, his hawk will flee,
Long since his followers fled,
The red fox knows where his grave may be,
The badger hath seen him dead.

The squirrel that through the green wood hies Espied him where, last he stood,
And the little bird that lowly flies
Will dip its wing in his blood.

The volume has thought throughout and some distinction of form. What it chiefly lacks is lyric movement.

ONE of the most extraordinary books of verse that we ever expect to see is the Poems of Oliver Orchard (Wilson & Macmillan). Mr. Orchard is in revolt, and he calls on his Muse to help him. She has not helped him well. He is in revolt against Mrs. Grundy, and against royal authors, and against parvenus, and against every kind of humbug, and against evening dress. This is his attitude towards evening dress:

Of alamodes that have their roots in vulgar-mindedness,
Not least contemptible is that of wearing evening dress.
If th’ upper circles ever gain a proper sense of dignity,
This senseless moult crepuscular we shall no longer see.

There is not much to complain of in the phrase “moult crepuscular.” We commend Mr. Orchard’s tirades: not for their clarity, their good taste, nor their music, but purely as curiosities.

WE are pleasantly reminded a little of Locker and a little of Mr. Dobson in Mr. J. A. Bridges’s In a Village (Mathews) volume—a collection of homely, simple, honest verse answering to the title. Here are two stanzas from a pretty bit of sentiment called “The Old Church”:

Old sin-worn roof, how many prayers
Your ready chinks have upward passed!
How many thousand hardening cares
Of weary men on Heaven you’ve cast!
The shoemaker’s remorseful throes,
The soul-touched grocer’s promise rasher,
The penitence that weekly rose
From publican and haberdasher.

And could I still, as oft before
I was on many a happy Sunday,
Be here the little child once more
I may have ceased to be on Monday,
And shed my troubles when I come
To this dear porch, I would not sorrow,
No glimpse of the millennium
Forbade me take them up to-morrow.

Mr. Bridges lacks the epigrammatic touch, but he is better company than many more ambitious poets.

WE must admit that on coming to a volume entitled Ballads of Evolution (Camborne Printing Co.) we expect more than its author, Mr. Herbert Thomas, gives us. The name is so full and impressive. But Mr. Thomas, although no creative scientific mind is his, is genial and right-hearted, and a true son of Cornwall. By way of frontispiece he offers his own portrait, in fancy dress; which may be a triumph of Nathan's art, but is not the best preparation for serious verses. We may mention that Mr. Thomas is among the poets who eulogise Mr. Gladstone.

NOVELS of modern life in blank verse are hard reading, but they sometimes yield amusing results. It may be said generally that no one possessing a sense of humour would attempt such a task: hence when such a task is attempted there is sport for the cynical observer. Edmund: a Metrical Tale (Stock), by Mr. Albert L. Carpenter, is not destitute of sport. Here is a passage:

Gradual the cicatrice affliction's plough
Had torn in Edith's heart less aching smoothed.
And with th' increasing stir of life her love
Sprang from its ashes like the Phoenix, flapped
Its all-enfolding pinions as of old,
Expelling every suppliant to the heart,
His eyrie.

Subsequently Edith enters a nunnery, while Edmund becomes a philanthropist. We cannot honestly say that poesy is the richer for Edmund: a Metrical Tale, but collectors of odd euphemisms may be.

THE author of Scotland for Ever (Douglas), Mr. R. W. Seton Watson, is intensely patriotic. After his poetry, we are tempted to read anti-Scottish sentiments by Dr. Johnson, or the saturnine John Cleveland, by way of antidote. But to Caledonians stern and wild this little book should be welcome. Also to Wykehamists, for there is a section devoted to Winchester School. We quote a stanza from a football song:

Here's a health to all Wykehamists—Blue, Red, or Brown.
May they ne'er meet in life one who can hot them down!
For they'll rally round Canvas as oft as they may,
And still love the old School, with its world and its play.

Wykehamists will know what "hotting down" is. We can only conjecture.

WHEN a man calls himself a jester we are led to expect either fun or pathos. Mr. Raymond Coulson, the author of A Jester's Jingles (Skeffington), has little of the first and none of the second. He offers mere comic-paper verse. The echo of Mr. Swinburne's "Match" is one of his best things:

If you were "Honeydew," dear,
And I the silver leaf,
A cigarette we'd be, dear,
And I would cling to thee, dear,
Together I and you, dear,
Would share our fiery grief,
If you were "Honeydew," dear,
And I the paper leaf.

The confusion of "you" and "thee" ought to have been avoided; but this Jester has no eyes for such niceties.

MR. REGINALD B. SPAN'S Poems of Two Worlds (Digby & Long) we notice because it is typical of so many volumes of verse that reach us. The others we are not considering; it is quite useless; the authors do not write for criticism, but sing because they must, and blame or praise is immaterial. Most of them are fairly fluent—Mr. Span is; have very little to say—Mr. Span has; say it without distinction—Mr. Span does (thus:

A child of Nature, frank and true,
Upholding Nature's banner:
Brave and noble, through and through, Disciple of Diana), and are gentle and innocent of malice. To notice such work serves no purpose.

Gladstone: a Depreciation.

Democracy and Liberty. By W. E. Lecky. New Edition. (Longmans. 12s.)

IN an Introduction to the new edition of Democracy and Liberty Mr. Lecky has endeavoured to determine the place which Mr. Gladstone will occupy in history. We are sure that in doing so he has tried to be fair; we are equally sure that he has not succeeded. It was perhaps impossible that he should. The observer, at Chamounix cannot appreciate the height of Mont Blanc—he is overshadowed by the majestic mass, and must either remove himself many miles or scale the summit if he is to realise the mountain's greatness. The mere fact of being Mr. Gladstone's contemporary prevents Mr. Lecky from doing the one, and, as for the other, only a Bismarck or a Beaconsfield could hope to attempt it with success. Mr. Lecky, it is only fair to say, frankly admits that the time has not yet come when the definite verdict of history can be pronounced on that extraordinary career and yet more extraordinary mind; but we feel constrained to add that we wish he made no attempt to anticipate it. The world would have lost an excellent example of Mr. Lecky's always admirable style, but it would have been spared the spectacle of a great historian descending to the level of a party pamphleteer.

There is so much that had better have been left unsaid. Take, for instance, the following passage:

Few men have had so many faces, and the wonderful play of his features contributed very largely to the effectiveness of his speaking. It was a countenance eminently fitted to express enthusiasm, pathos, profound melancholy, commanding power and lofty disdain; there were moments when it could take an expression of intense cunning, and it often darkened into a scowl of passionate anger. In repose it did not seem to me good. With its tightly compressed lips and fierce, abstracted gaze it seemed to express not only extreme determination, but also great vindictiveness, a quality, indeed, by no means wanting in his nature, though it was, I think, more frequently directed against classes or parties than against individuals. He had a wonderful eye—a bird-of-prey eye—fierce, luminous and restless. "When he differed from you," a great friend and admirer of his once said to me, "there were moments when he would give you a glance as if he would stab you to the heart." There was something, indeed, in his eye in which more than one experienced judge saw dangerous symptoms of possible insanity.

That is not history: it is merely brilliant scandal, and the final sentence is equally cruel and unworthy of the writer. It may well be that posterity will not endorse "the language of indiscriminating eulogy" which followed Mr. Gladstone's death, but we feel even more certain that it will reject the suggestion that "the texture of his intellect was commonplace," or that "the subtleties and ingenuities of distinction in which he was inexhaustibly futile were nearly always the mere subtleties of debate." The author of such an estimate of such a mind almost brings us to believe that he shares the vulgar error of rejecting as absurd all dialectic which the listener cannot immediately receive. Much the same criticism has, we believe, been made upon St. Thomas Aquinas, but the Angelic Doctor remains and his critics make no great figure to-day.

Mr. Lecky has not failed to note the width of Mr. Gladstone's mind, but he has failed to measure its depths. To Mr. Lecky he is an enthusiastic and wholly untrustworthy rhetorician, permeated with a kind of religion of which our author has little knowledge and with which he has no sympathy, and gifted with a conveniently elastic conscience. To our mind he completely misses the key to Mr. Gladstone's almost unique character—that intense and magnificent egoism which has dominated all the great leaders of mankind. Mr. Gladstone believed in himself as Mahomet believed in himself, as Napoleon, as Cæsar. Withal, he was religious—Christian, if you will—to the very core of his being, and every moment when he was out of power was a moment in which the work of the Devil was being done. This, and not the introduction "into the perorations of his political and even party speeches" of "God, duty, honour, justice, moral obligation, Divine guidance," was the secret at once of his tremendous power over his fellow-countrymen, and of his amazing readiness to adopt any policy which seemed likely to restore him to power. To Mr. Lecky this makes him appear in his later years as a mere demagogue; but there were never two characters so dissimilar as those of Gladstone and Cleon, even when the English statesman seemed most indebted to the arts of the Athenian politician.

To the aristocratic trend of Mr. Gladstone's nature Mr. Lecky does full justice, but he does not seem to us to appreciate at all the innate conservatism of his mind. It is no paradox, but the simple truth, that he was never at any time a Liberal in the sense that the great bulk of his followers were and are. For injustice he had an almost divine hatred, but for privilege he had not even dislike. Nothing is more helpful in endeavouring to estimate his real sentiments than to note the gradual process of change in his mind which accompanied the remarkable struggle that ended in the disestablishment of the Irish Church. There was nothing of the Liberation Society about his attitude. Into that great revolution he was forced, as he conceived, by the inexorable logic of circumstances which drove him to a choice of evils. What he did he did strongly, and it is no reproach to him that, having once made up his mind to a change of front, he bent all the resources of his splendid moral and intellectual gifts to carry his countrymen with him. Mr. Gladstone was, perhaps, the most inconsistent statesman who ever ruled a great empire, but, Mr. Lecky notwithstanding, he was always sincere.

The School Beside the Abbey.

Annals of Westminster School. By J. Sargeaunt. (Methuen. 7s. 6d.)

MR. SARGEAUNT's history is straightforward and sober. For quaintness the reader must search diligently, for humour he will look in vain; but if he is intent only on the life of the School, from its inception to the present day, he will find all that he asks. He must not ask for trimmings.

To our mind the Busby chapter is the making of the book as a book. Busby began as a Westminster boy, passed to Oxford, where he gained fame both as a scholar and an actor (acted, indeed, so well that he might have taken to the stage as a profession had not the opportunity of ruling Westminster come to him). He was made head master in 1638, and remained in control until 1695. This means that during one of England's most unsettled periods, and a time when more than once the School seemed doomed, Busby held to his post and conquered all difficulties. This is the more remarkable when we remember that Busby was a Royalist. He was, however, accused of ploughing with Parliamentary heifers. Let us leave it by calling him a man of nice tact. One of his most trying experiences was the conflict with Edward Bagshaw, who became in 1656 second master, in succession to Thomas Vincent, whose susceptibility to false Latin was such that he could endure his post no longer. Bagshaw no sooner was in a position of authority than he showed himself a Roundhead and a puppy. He scoffed at Busby's classes in Arabic, he suggested that Busby's Greek grammar might be improved. He wore his hat in the Abbey. Busby tried several plans to make the place too hot for him, and at last procured his suspension. Bagshaw, however, refused to obey, and fortified himself in the tower of the dormitory. Thither, under Busby's instructions, went an army of the boys and removed Bagshaw by force. Few schoolboys have such opportunities.

Subsequently Bagshaw took the only revenge left to angry scholars: he wrote a book against Busby. But he had been born under an evil star, and it all profited him nothing. He became a Conventicler, was haled to various prisons, and died comparatively young. Busby did not lay down his authority until he was a very old man. During his fifty-seven years of office he practically made the School. Mr. Sargeaunt, however, says very little of Busby as a man. Of his terrible swishings there is no word, neither allegation nor denial, although the legends that have gathered about them are numerous; nor does he offer a list of Busby's more famous pupils. Considering how largely Busby bulks in the history of Westminster, we think that less than justice has been done to him. He is one of the great picturesque figures of scholasticism, and Mr. Sargeaunt should have remembered this. One of the Deans of Westminster during Busby's time was John Dolben, whose glory it was in the Great Fire to march a body of King's scholars to the flaming city and there save the church of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East. Afterwards William Taswell, one of the Westminsters, stood upon the bridge in Palace-yard and read Terence by the light of burning St. Paul's. This should obliterate Nero's great feat.

WESTMINSTER IN 1650.—(From the Etching by Hollar.)

Mr. Sargeant places in his appendix some old accounts, and fragments of letters written in 1690 by Mary, Countess of Caithness, concerning her son Colin, then at the School. We quote a passage :

Colin is a busie man at all his leasons is every day at Scoul all this winter befor 7 o'clock and his wax candle with him and doth not come out until past ij and they retorne at i and stays until neir six; this was far from his dyot at hom; and in the great cold Scoul he sits the whole day over wth out a hatt or cap; and all the windows broak and yet thanks be to god he taks very wel wth it tho he never seeth a fir but in my hous; at the begining his felow scolers were hard on him upon the account of his Nation but he dooth now hold up pretie wel either at scolding or boxing with them; however, I fear I los a Scotsman for he begins to get ther words and actsent.

Here we leave a book which we cannot consider has been well enough done. There is material and to spare; but Mr. Sargeant lacks the capacity to treat it with the interest it deserves. It is not enough, in writing the history of a great and illustrious school, morely to state events in their order of occurence. There are human touches needed too, character-sketches, and the many little splashes of colour that make histories live. The book has many excellent pictures—views and portraits—one of which we reproduce.

Salmon and Sea-Trout.

Salmon and Sea-Trout. By Sir Herbert Maxwell. "The Angler's Library." (Lawrence & Bullen.)

[BY A SCOTS ANGLER.]

THE coming of Sir Herbert Maxwell's book reminds me that on certain waters in Scotland the season during which salmon may be lawfully caught has already opened. I should like to be fishing, even though the air is snell; but, as duty ties me to town, I have been spending a happy afternoon over Sir Herbert's latest work. Sir Herbert writes so many books that I wonder how he finds time to fish; but there can be no doubt that he does fish, and he put his experiences to good use. This is really an excellent work. In thoroughness and in style it is much above the average book on angling. Most anglers, when they seek to shine in literature, become complacent persons, gar-rulous or pompous, who bore us to the verge of slumber but Sir Herbert Maxwell is not one of these. He has approached his theme in a workmanlike spirit, and has achieved his task with workmanlike precision. The book, it is true, is not all new. Frequently we come upon chapters which I have read in serial sheets. Still, I am not annoyed. Notably as regards his theories that salmon do not feed in fresh water, and that salmon and trout are colour-blind, he received much criticism when he was publishing his expositions serially; and, although he has not changed his opinions much, he has paid respect to the criticisms, and always, when dealing with disputed points, writes with temperance. In short, this work presents to us the ripest knowledge of its subject which is available.

It cannot have been easy to write the book. Even by the water-side, with rod in hand and fish on the feed, it is difficult to teach the art of angling. One may have full knowledge; but the knowledge, through years of practice, has become instinctive, and an instinct is exactly the thing which you cannot impart. As well try to make a German scholar adopt the literary style of Stevenson as hope for immediate and successful results from the clearest instructions as to how a novice is to get the fly to the fish. The last man I essayed to teach had been a bushranger in Australia. He thought he would manage all right if he used the rod as he was wont to use the bullock-whip. The result was painful. "Crack!" went the tail-fly in the air behind him, and when the line fell in a coil at his feet the lure was no longer on the cast. A timorous gentleness is little less disastrous. It also lands the line in a coil somewhere. Sir Herbert Maxwell knows this difficulty so well that he looks the knotty point straight in the face and passes jocularly on. His remark is worth reciting:

Take the Spey cast, for example—that knack by which a long line is drawn from the water in bewildering curves till the fly rests for a moment on the stream close in front of the angler, apparently utterly out of his control, when a smart downward cut of the rod sends it whirling thirty yards across the current—who can describe the exact adjustment of poise and force essential to the execution of this most difficult manœuvre? Not I, forsooth, for I am no master of the Spey cast. When there is a cliff or a high bank behind me, when the stream runs at a kindly angle and the wind is not too unfriendly, above all, when there is no professional critic looking on, I am able to project the line somehow in fair fashion towards the desired place. But as for trying to explain how this is done—perish the thought!

That is right. Any endeavour to explain an instinctive aptitude would be quite useless. All casts, however, are not so difficult as the Spey cast; and no novice in angling who chances to read these words need be scared by the passage from Sir Herbert which I have quoted. All knowledge about his subject which is capable of being set forth on the printed page Sir Herbert Maxwell conveys lucidly.

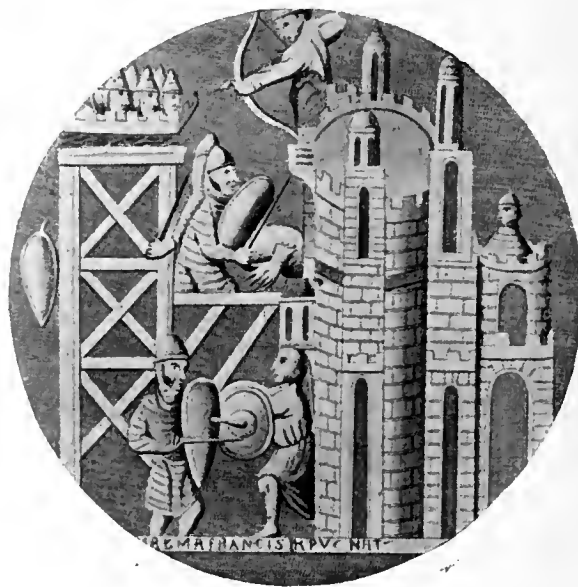

The opening chapter arrested my attention much. Like most men in this pessimistic time, I was under the impression that the poacher and the Lord Manufacturer were, between them, rapidly ruining the salmon streams. I was wrong. The poacher, indeed, has well-nigh ruined the Tweed, once the best salmon river in the kingdom. The poacher there is a constituent of honourable members of the Commons' House of Parley who respect their seats more than their souls; the Lord Manufacturer supplies the funds to administer which, when Parley sets to work again, someone will be appointed in room of Sir William Harcourt as chief trustee in the estate of the late Liberal Party; consequently, there being so many poachers, and the Lord Manufacturer being always free to flourish a shut purse before the beards of the distraught gentlemen who carry on the business of Progress and Reform, the Tweed is both robbed and polluted with impunity. In nearly all other suitable waters, however, fish of the salmon-kind, instead of becoming fewer, are prospering greatly. Sir Herbert Maxwell is able to give quite a cheerful account of the good which fish-culture, together with improved drainage, is achieving. The stock of salmon in the Aberdeenshire Dee "has enormously increased"; the fine rivers of Sutherland show a marked improvement; the north Tyne "became in an amazingly short space of years the most prolific salmon river in England"; "next to it in amount of produce of salmon comes the Usk," which once was a cause of depression to many a sportsman. Even the Thames has a brightening future. Below London it is now actually less polluted than the Tyne in its lower reaches; and, on the authority of Sir Herbert Maxwell, we may expect to be salmon-fishing successfully not far above Richmond. All this is the best of news; but it renders me the more intolerant of the state of affairs here and there in Scotland. Some means to put an end to the desolating clash of interests between the upper proprietors and the lower must be found. Sir Herbert Maxwell makes suggestions on that matter, and I trust that when next the subject is before Parliament the Irish patriots will be good enough not to block the Bill. The poachers and the captains of industry on the Tweed cause graver thoughts; but there might be a way with them also. The means of which I am thinking is sanctioned by the sacred memory of Mr. Gladstone, who, wishing to Liberalise the Lords without abolishing the Second Chamber, thought of strengthening the Peerage by adding to it five hundred Liberals chosen at random. Why should not the Queen, advised by Lord Salisbury, confer knighthoods or baronetcies on all the Radical legislators who come from Borderland? The honourable gentlemen might then feel it due to themselves to cultivate sportsmanlike and other ancient prejudices appropriate to men of rank, and that would mean the undoing of their understanding with those who are ruining the river on which Sir Walter fished. Lest anyone should suspect that I have been writing in a Tory temper inimical to the Rights of Man, I will, to show that I am a humanitarian philosopher after all, conclude these few remarks by echoing, with fervour, a thoroughly sound social sentiment from the scriptures of Sir Herbert Maxwell: "The favourite argument that God made fish, not for the diversion of landlords, but for the use of mankind, may be extended indefinitely. God made strawberries as well as salmon; but if all the strawberry-beds were thrown open to the public by Act of Parliament, how many people would get enough to make any jam?"

The Great Sultan.

Saladin and the Fall of the Kingdom of Jerusalem. By Stanley Lane-Poole. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s.)

It is a remarkable fact that although Saladin's is a household name this is the first English biography of him that has been published. Scott's portrait of the chivalrous

THE TAKING OF JERUSALEM.

From a Painted Window at St. Denis (Twelfth Century).

Moslem in The Talisman is excellent, but it has neither the fulness nor the sanction of biography. Mr. Lane-Poole is the first English writer to approach the subject of Saladin and his civil and military exploits with the will and the ability to treat them thoroughly. He has gone to the two Arabic records—those of Bahn-ed-din and Ibn-el-Athir—and to the other Eastern writings in which Saladin's life is preserved; and also to several chronicles on the Christian side, notably those of William of Tyre and Ernoul, and the Itinerary of Richard II. Nearly all these records are contemporary, and Mr. Lane-Poole has constructed from them a narrative at once exhaustive and vivid. He has reduced his introductory matter to the smallest limit possible, confining it to a survey of the Mohammedan world in the century preceding Saladin's birth in 1138. The quaint illustration which we reproduce belongs to the First Crusade, and represents the taking of Jerusalem in 1099.

Almost a hundred years after this date Saladin laid his great siege to the walls of the Holy City, with a success and with accompaniments of chivalry and mercy which still dazzle the imagination. It was on September 20, 1187, that he took up his position on the west side of the city, but the towers of Tancred and David, and the sun vexing the eyes of his soldiers, he moved to the eastern walls. The Christians thought he had abandoned the siege; they knew better on the morrow, and on October 2, with bleeding hearts, they signed the capitulation. They were then prisoners of war, and must ransom themselves within forty days, each man to pay ten pieces of gold for his liberty, and two women or ten children to be reckoned as one man. Of the poor seven thousand should go free on payment of thirty thousand besants. The clearing of the city and the ransoming were carried out in perfect order, with due severity but with unheard-of mercy. The Christians were distracted to leave Jerusalem, but they left, paying their ransoms at the gate of David.

For forty days the melancholy procession trooped forth from the gate of David, and the term of grace expired. Yet there still remained thousands of poor people whom the niggardly burghers and religious houses had left to slavery. Then el-Adil came to his brother and said: "Sire, I have helped you by God's grace to conquer the land and this city, I therefore pray you give me a thousand slaves from the poor people within." To Saladin's question, what he would do with them, he answered he would do as pleased himself. Then the Sultan gave him the thousand slaves, and el-Adil set them all free as an offering to God. Then came the Patriarch and Balian, and begged likewise, and Saladin gave them another thousand slaves, and they were set free. Then said Saladin to his officers: "My brother has made his alms, and the Patriarch and Balian have made theirs, now I would fain make mine." And he ordered his guards to proclaim throughout the streets of Jerusalem that all the old people who could not pay were free to go forth. And they came forth from the postern of St. Lazarus, and their going lasted from the rising of the sun until night fell.

Such was Saladin's greatness of soul. Let the reader who desires to know his bravery, his amiability at court, his endurance in the field, his wholehearted will to spend and be spent in the Islam cause, consult Mr. Lane-Poole's full and interesting pages.

Royal Biography.

Elizabeth, Empress of Austria. By A. de Burgh. (Hutchinson.)

THIS book had, of course, to be written, and written after a certain convention. Mr. de Burgh adopts the proper attitude and writes it on his knees. His qualifications appear to be that he has "personally had the happiness of meeting the illustrious lady," that he "has had the privilege of knowing some of those who were in her entourage," and that he has access to certain newspaper files. He has also a profound respect for members of Imperial and Royal houses as well as for those in their entourage. Thus equipped he conducts us through palaces, and discourses of illustrious personages and Imperial consorts with the air of the butler who shows you over the historic mansion. One of the entourage must have told him how the Archduke Rudolf "proposed in person" to Princess Stephanie in the conservatory at Laeken. "As soon as they were alone, the Crown Prince approached her Royal Highness with a low and formal obeisance, saying, 'Madam, will you take me for a husband?' To which plain question the Princess simply replied, curtsying deeply, 'Yes, your Imperial Highness.' 'Your Royal Highness's answer makes me supremely happy,' observed the Archduke." Such is the world into which Mr. de Burgh gives us a glimpse—over the shoulders of the entourage. He is also able to tell us which of Heine's poems the Empress marked in her volumes, and even to give us a translation of them. Here is the first. You cannot fail to recognise it:

Your little hand lay on my heart, dearest dear!
Do you in that small room a great knocking hear?
There a carpenter dwells, hard and cunning is he,
Who is nailing together a coffin for me.

That will suffice to give you the measure of the author's literary style.

The Kingdom of Rhodes.

Rhodesia and its Government. By H. C. Thomson. (Smith, Elder & Co. 10s. 6d.)

THIS book is a very curious amalgam, and belongs to what may be called the Balaam order of literature. Mr. Thomson, who is apparently a war correspondent, would seem to have gone out to South Africa as what is nowadays called a Commissioner, and it is plain that he had strong notions about Mr. Rhodes and Rhodesia and ethics, which somehow seem stronger in a London armchair than on the veldt among the Matabili. But Mr. Thomson has come under the personal influence and magnetism of Mr. Rhodes, and cannot help letting his admiration of the empire-maker slip out, even though it seems against the grain. He notes that in Mashonaland a man said to him that nobody wanted to interfere with Lord Salisbury. "As long as he lives he will be the Premier, but when he dies Cecil Rhodes is going to be the next Prime Minister, and he'll settle the native question because he understands all about it." Mr. Thomson confesses that Mr. Rhodes's enormous power is due to his personality as much as to his wealth, and that even in the Dutch Republics they do not think that he is influenced by sordid motives, but by ambition. But, after acknowledging that a strong personal feeling for Mr. Rhodes exists all over South Africa, and especially in Rhodesia, the writer goes on to make the extraordinary assertion that the English Government ought not to take this into account when dealing with the question of the revocation of the Charter, but should "consider the broad principles of right and wrong."

If the English Government were ever so foolish as to ignore South African feeling in this matter, they would raise a pretty storm about their ears, for the one thing a colonist resents is uncalled-for dictation from home. Mr. Thomson is good enough to say that the Chartered Company have failed to govern rightly, not wilfully, but from weakness of administration and extent of territory. That they have acquired more land than they can govern he thinks is the truth of the matter. The book was evidently not written with any such intention, but the impression left by its perusal is that unless Great Britain wishes to fling South Africa after the United States she will do well to support those of her blood who are making their homes and carving out new provinces in the wide lands north of Cape Town.

A Painter's Memories.

Sketches from Memory. By G. A. Storey, A.R.A. (Chatto & Windus. 12s. 6d.)

THE career of a painter working his way along acknowledged grooves is not likely to harvest any very thrilling experiences. Mr. Storey's book is not thrilling, but it is mildly entertaining. As a youth Mr. Storey saw something of the Revolution of 1848 in Paris, as a young artist he perambulated Spain, and his French and Spanish experiences are set down here with a light hand and with the aid of sketches. Returning from France, Mr. Storey became the friend and disciple of a much older artist, Charles Robert Leslie, R.A. The Leslie home was "full of sunshine and laughter, full of originality, humour, and kindness." We do not doubt this, but it is one thing to say so, and another thing to make jokes and kindnesses which were successful in their setting appear remarkable and interesting on paper, and Mr. Storey's anecdotes of the family strike us as being a little thin.

Mr. Storey saw much of Sir Edwin Landseer, and once saw him imitate a pig with effect. Sir Edwin had a most faithful valet who was called Cerberus. Cerberus would protect his master from disturbance at any cost, and several times told Prince Albert that "Sir Hedwin was hout." Once, when accompanying his master to the north by train, Cerberus fussed greatly about the luggage. "How about them luggage?" he shouted to the guard. "What luggage?" "Why, two trunks as black as hink and marked with hell?" "Marked with what?" "Why, hell for Landseer, of course."

Mr. Storey takes us back to that dingy studio in Newman-street kept by James Mathews Leigh. Leigh was a wonderful talker, insomuch that one old gentleman of means affected to be anxious to study art, and came regularly with the best equipments, his real aim being to listen to the plain-speaking, caustic art master. One of Leigh's aversions was unmeaning phrases. Calling on him once, Mr. Storey said as he entered, "I hope I don't interrupt you?" To which Leigh replied, "You can't help interrupting me if you come in." "Then I will go out again." "That is quite a different thing; I don't want you to go out again, but society is full of these unmeaning phrases." The largest proportion of Mr. Storey's pages is occupied with his memories of Spain, and here his narrative is wholly entertaining.

The New Far East.

The New Far East. By Arthur Diósy. (Cassell. 16s.)

MR. Diósy's book is not written for the expert, but for the many who, knowing a little about the Far East, desire to know more. It is a study of the three nations—the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Koreans; and of their relations to one another and to Europe in the conditions created by the new state of things arising out of the defeat of China by Japan in 1894. It seems strange at first sight that a gentleman of Hungarian extraction should be vice-president of the Japan Society; but perhaps the explanation is found in Mr. Diósy's remark that the Magyars were originally of the same stock as the races of the Far East.

The author deals exhaustively with the subject, and is refreshingly accurate in his statements. But this does not imply that he is not amusing, for his book can be read by even that nonentity, the general reader, without any serious mental strain. Mr. Diósy gives us a word of warning concerning the term "Jap," which is used by us with no insulting intention, but which is most offensive to the punctilious Japanese. So much does it irritate them that a Japanese gentleman once observed to Mr. Diósy, "If you people call us Japs, we shall"—he paused before gravely uttering the dire threat—"we shall have to call you Brits!" It is to be feared that even this will not deter those among us who long for brevity at any cost from their evil ways; but, on the other hand, the Japanese themselves do not always consult European prejudices. For example, there is a dark legend of an elderly nobleman who attended a reception on New Year's Day in Japan in European evening dress complete in every respect but one—the outfitter from whom he had ordered his ceremonial garb had omitted to send home the trousers. But possibly this is only an invention of the evilly disposed. Mr. Diósy's remarks on the home-life of the Japanese are written, not from the point of view of the hurried traveller, but from that of one who has intimate friends among the people, and looks at things from the inside.

Mr. Diósy defends the women of Japan, and points out that the Geisha is not the type, but the exception, among Japanese womanhood. To be helpful is the one object the Japanese woman is taught to strive for: helpful to her husband's parents, to her husband, to her children—just as she has in girlhood been helpful to her own parents. And nobly does she realise what is expected of her. But the young wife has not altogether an enviable position, for by one of those queer topsy-turvydoms which occur in Japan, the mother-in-law—who, in the West, is so often the object of cheap satire—is a veritable terror in the Far East—to the wife. The husband's mother insists on being obeyed by her daughter-in-law, and on seeing that her beloved son is made thoroughly comfortable by the wife he has brought home. In the lower classes she frequently enforces her theories with her metal tobacco-pipe, so that wives have been known to seek refuge in suicide. Thanks to Mr. Diósy, it is possible to get a fair insight into the Far Eastern mode of thought, and the newspaper-reader will have to thank him for a good deal of light thrown on the perplexing Far Eastern Question. The value of the book is increased by the excellent illustrations drawn by the famous Japanese artist Kubota Beisen, who, though he has studied in Europe, is more successful with purely Japanese subjects than with studies in Western costume.

Postscript.

LIGHT-HEARTED and light-headed subalterns, sardonic privates, peppery colonels and majors, long-suffering wives of officers—these are the puppets of Lieut.-Colonel Nownham Davis's Military Dialogues (Sands & Co.)—a most amusing and deft collection of army humours. The background in the main is India, but it shifts to England and Aldershot. Practical jokes; the "taking over" of a regimental theatre; a little wife's bravery in refusing to let her distant husband know of the extortions of the native servants—these are some of the subjects. The material is slight enough, but the author has geniality and wit, and a light touch that carries him through with splendid spirit. Military Dialogues is the best humorous book about the army that has been published for a long time.

A new edition—the sixth—of Mr. Edwin W. Streeter's Precious Stones and Gems (Bell) has just been issued. Mr. Streeter has so revised his work that it belongs absolutely to the present year. There is a coloured plate of Indian blue diamonds which is a joy to look upon.

Whyte-Melville's romance, Cerise, reaches us in Messrs. Ward & Lock's new three-and-sixpenny edition. It has several lively illustrations by Mr. G. P. Jacomb-Hood.

In Wonders of the Bird World (Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co.) we have the gist of lectures delivered by Mr. R. Bowdler Sharpe on "Curiosities of Bird Life" in many parts of the United Kingdom during the last ten years. The book is a survey of the more striking and curious facts in ornithology—such as would interest an audience and may still awaken interest in readers who have been hitherto indifferent to a fascinating study.

The Year's Art (Virtue) is just out of its teens. The feature of this indispensable handbook is a series of portraits of gentlemen who own collections. Details of each collector's treasures are given. In the portraits the art student may read, if he is a physiognomist, his probable fate when he asks "permission to view."

Messrs. Mudie send us a new edition of their Catalogue. It is a well-printed book, and, apart from its obvious use, may be used for reference with advantage.

Few English tourists who crowd the Swiss hotels have anything but a mere guide-book acquaintance with the history of Switzerland. This is the fact which probably inspired Mr. E. Salisbury to translate Dr. Karl Dändliker's Manual of the History of the Swiss People under the title of A Short History of Switzerland. (Sonnenschein.) Mr. Salisbury has followed the second, and greatly improved, edition of Dr. Dändliker's work. The arrangement of the book is regulated by parts and numbered sections, and there is a good supply of maps.

Fiction.

The Two Standards. By William Barry.
(T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

WE have read few recent books so full of specifically modern interests as this. It is a storehouse of observations and trenchant criticisms, a museum of latter-day types, and an inventory, if we may use the word, of clamorous problems. To say this is not necessarily to praise the book as fiction; and, indeed, its faults on this score must be apparent to the most casual reader. Dr. Barry, whom we have known as a distinguished Quarterly Reviewer, and as the author of The New Antigone, has given us rather the material for art to work upon than the finished product. His point of view is far more the moralist's than the artist's; his sense of the emotional cruces of modern life is so keen that the dramatic is apt to merge in the rhetorical, and the novelist to become a mere recorder. The book is very rich in the root-qualities of literature, but the multiplicity of problems has baffled the author, and he has sacrificed form to fulness, and renounced the selecting and pruning which is the life of art. Such seems to be the main fictional weakness of the work; its merits, conspicuous as they are, belong more properly to another sphere.

The title is taken from one of the Exercises of St. Ignatius, the famous parable which is the Christian counterpart of the Choice of Herakles. The problem is as old as the world—the choice between the pleasing evil and the bitter good. At first everything is obscure: other tests predominate and the great moral distinction has not emerged. The purpose of the book is to trace the progress from indeterminate ease to the crisis which arrives soon or late for every man, when the standard of right and wrong reveals itself as solitary and final. But this is a mere general description; in detail the problem presents itself in a thousand forms. From first to last the history of Marian Greystoke's life is a tissue of problems—from the schwärmerisch girl's longing for the great world, to the final renunciation of the lust of the eyes and the pride of life. The antagonism between a harsh evangelical creed and poor human nature, between commercialism and art, between love and duty, between the tinsel and the gold in character—all are presented with great clarity and truth. It is this which makes the book complex and episodic. There are scores of wheels within wheels, dramas in the Æschylean manner within dramas; the author demands a solution of each problem which arises with a moralist's insistence, and he presents each side fairly with more than a moralist's candour. The work is significant in a dozen ways—as an essay in modern realism which demands adequacy in detail, as a "tale of unrest" which forbids a facile completeness, and, maybe, as a revolt, in the manner of Aylwin, against a dapper and artificially perfect construction.

The writing is in the grand manner—very rich, coloured, and melodious. We think it less successful in the elaborate descriptions of the production of Elven's two great musical dramas, than in more simple efforts. The author writes of nature with a happy inspiration:

A calm, clear day, with slowly fading colours, warm in the west, tinging the whole sky with faintish purple, as of henna darkening the finger-tips, themselves rosy.

Or take this of German prose :

I don't feel sure that we have any prose. Goethe is a mellow pipe, playing soft pastorals clear as that blue sky, and almost as passionless. "Werther" was a tropical spring, soon past. Lessing blows great martial music out of bronze—classic bronze; he borrowed from the Romans, and is beyond imitation. Then there is Heine, in golden armour, stolen from the Middle Age, with a harlequin's jacket to damp and perplex the gleam, and a Hermes' wand wreathed about with roses and deadly-nightshade. That is all the prose we can call our own.

Sometimes the words have a sting :

Mr. Randall Stafford, who belonged to that pre-established harmony which fits the well-born for places of large emolument.

Or again :

Heroism never died out; nay, there was an enthusiasm of darkness as well as of light. The modern man, sometimes a recluse in his ivory tower, dedicated to literature, art, metaphysics, or self-indulgence, was often effeminate, but always given up to impulse. . . . Modern books reeked with a sadness too dreadful to be quite human. Behind their frivolous or desperate language the Terrible Shadow lurked. For the veil of things did not hide vacancy, but powers, conscious, never-dying, between whom a warfare went on always, most embittered in the heart of man.

But the finer things in the book defy quotation. Such are the account of the horror of Harland's madness in prison, the whole little idyll of "Rosa Munda," and the extraordinary chapter called "Mater Saeva Cupidinum." Now and then we feel a touch of the rhetorical, the overstrained, or the merely sentimental. The plan of the book, as we have said, is faulty; there is a little too much parade of erudition, and now and then a tendency to the dithyrambic spoils the dignity of style. But, apart from such failings, it is a strong and moving piece of work, full of knowledge and delicacy, a real transcript of life. Some time ago the study in modernity was sickly nervose, or at the best crudely propagandist. It is the merit of Dr. Barry's book that it is a transcript, sober and critical, with no moral save the old cosmic doctrine of right and wrong. His own words furnish the most succinct summary of the tale :

Two lives—and the struggle for victory—whichever won, the issue is tragic. Impulse and law, and the martyrs of each. The world-movement passing through their hearts. A romance, but also unalloyed reality.

The Borderland of Society. By Charles Belmont Davis.

(Chicago: Herbert S. Stone & Co. 6s.)

MR. DAVIS bears a name distinguished in modern American literature, and it must be said that he writes astonishingly like his more famous brother. There is the same attitude towards life, the same faculty for finding the picturesque, the same mild brightness of style. Most of the tales in this little volume have been taken from American magazines; it had been better if some—"La Gommeuse" and "The Story of His Life," for example—had remained there; but one or two are good. The best tales are a couple which happen not to have appeared in magazines.

"A Winter City Favourite" is a picture of Monte Carlo society, not showing much original observation perhaps, but treating picturesquely the obviously picturesque, and informed, towards the end, by genuine feeling and dramatic power. "At a Café Chontant" is even better—quite in the de Maupassant manner—but marred by a certain crudity in the presentation of the climax.

Mr. Davis has wandered in the purlieus of American and continental cities, and has a large reserve of exotic local colour, which he uses generously yet with discretion. The book is a mine of strange information. Here, for instance, is some dialogue between the freaks at a dime museum in New York :

"Killed him?" said the skeleton.

"Sure," said the legless man. "Died of a broken heart. She was a fine blonde, too. He met her from the platform, and married her a week later at her home in Harlem. They were very happy for a time, and then she took up with a ticket-chopper on the elevated road, and Radcliffe pined away and died. She certainly did treat him rough. You see, Billy couldn't walk by himself, as his legs weren't big enough to carry him; so when the ticket-chopper had finished his work he would come under the window and whistle, and the blonde woman would lift Billy out of his chair and lay him on his back, on the floor, while she went out. Billy used to lie there on his back, for all the world like a turtle, and kick and hollow [sic] for help. . . . And the worst of it was the blonde and the ticket-chopper got fifteen hundred dollars bones money."

"Bones money?" asked the skeleton.

"Don't you know what bones money is? Well, you are new in the business. Skeletons always sell their bones to a hospital before they die."

The virtues of Mr. Davis's first book are negative rather than positive. He has more restraint than power, more correctness than originality, more discretion than artistic courage. But what effects he attempts he accomplishes, and for the most part the tales are very creditable.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THINGS THAT HAVE HAPPENED. BY DOROTHEA GERARD.

Fifteen short stories by the author of A Forgotten Sin. They vary in complexion from comedy to tragedy, as these titles indicate: "A Bit of Blue China," "A Reprieve," "Captain Ludwey's Jump," "Iwan's Grave," &c.

THE PATHS OF THE PRUDENT. BY J. S. FLETCHER.

This novel is described as "a comedy." It is also perhaps to be described as a defence of phrenology, for the book opens with a delineation of the character of the heroine, Dorinthia Evadne Clementine Annwell, while she is yet an inmate of Miss Hypatia Watts's Home for the Upbringing of Prudent Maidens. The Professor speaks many times more plainly than phrenologists usually do, and does not hide from Miss Watts his conviction that the exceptionally demure Dorinthia Evadne Clementine Annwell will turn out an adventuress. It is perhaps no undue betrayal of the plot to add that in the last chapter Dorinthia Evadne Clementine Annwell is leaving the Frivolity Music Hall with the Earl of Whiteacres, and that the Professor, who has seen her, is smoking a cigar in deep thought. A very readable novel. (Methuen. 6s.)

The New Planet.

By an Astronomer.

IN the middle of last August a discovery of considerable interest to astronomers was made at the Urania Observatory, Berlin. A new planet was discovered. The importance of the discovery does not, however, entirely lie in the fact that a new member has been added to the solar system. During a period of just over a century such an event has repeatedly occurred. In 1782 Sir William Herschel discovered Uranus, a large planet more distant from the sun than any planet previously known. On the first night of the new century Piazzi discovered a small planet in the region between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. It had long been the idea of astronomers that this region was too vast to be entirely unoccupied by planets. There seemed to be a break in the series. Nearest to the sun is Mercury, then Venus; next comes the Earth, then Mars; then, after a double interval, Jupiter. Piazzi's new planet turned out, however, to be too small to be a worthy companion of the other known planets. In rapid succession, however, more small planets were discovered, and the obvious suggestion was that a planet of respectable size had broken up. More and more planets were discovered. It soon became too troublesome to follow them all. It even became too troublesome to name them. After the first few had been discovered, numbers were used for ready reference. Now letters are used. The new planet is called DQ. The rate at which new planets are discovered may perhaps be best illustrated by remarking that there is already a planet DR. Interest in the discovery of minor planets was, however, almost destroyed by the discovery of another large planet, Neptune, further away even than Uranus, in 1846.

Considering that several hundred minor planets are known, it may be asked why the discovery of planet DQ should be thought so interesting as to be worthy of a paragraph in the newspapers. The reason is, that the orbit of the new planet lies between the earth and Mars, instead of between Mars and Jupiter, as is the case with all the other minor planets. This fact alone places it in a separate category, and entitles its discovery to rank in importance next after the discoveries of Uranus, Neptune, and the first few minor planets. But the comparative nearness of the new planet is of interest in other ways than as a mere anomaly, a kind of record-breaking. At intervals of a little more than two years the new planet comes into opposition to the sun—that is to say, the earth lies very nearly between the planet and the sun. It will be readily understood, by drawing two circles with the same centre to represent the orbits of the earth and the planet round the sun, that it is in this position that the planet's distance from the earth is least. When, however, an opposition occurs in January the distance is unusually small, for the planet does not move in a circle round the sun, but in an ellipse, and it will then be in that part of the ellipse which is nearest to the sun. These conditions are fulfilled in 1900, though the opposition in that year will by no means be exceptionally favourable. It will be looked forward to by astronomers with considerable interest, for the planet will then supply a means of determining the sun's distance from the earth with at least as great accuracy as any other method available. Newton's law of gravitation determines accurately the plan of the solar system, but it does not give its scale. The scale can only be determined by measuring one line or distance, and all other distances are then immediately determined. When the favourable opportunity arrives, astronomers will try to measure the distance of the new planet. The principle of the method in which this will be done is this: Two observers at some considerable distance from each other will see the planet in slightly different directions, the difference in direction being, of course, the angle at the planet formed by the two lines of sight drawn from the two observers to the planet. As a refinement on the method, it may be mentioned that it is not absolutely necessary to have two observers, since the rotation of the earth on its axis will in a few hours carry an observer several thousands of miles away from the position in space that he occupied earlier in the evening. Now, if this angle can be measured, the distance of the planet is known, and the nearer the planet the bigger the angle will be, and the easier to measure. The distance of the sun is supposed to be about ninety-three million miles, but this estimate may, possibly, be wrong by about a quarter of a million miles. The new planet may be the means of reducing this uncertainty.

The brightness of the planet, of course, varies considerably with its distance from the earth and its position relatively to the sun. When at its nearest it will probably be visible with opera-glasses, not, however, in all probability, to the naked eye. It is not expected that it will even then be more than a point of light. Its diameter, by a very rough estimate, may be put down as twenty miles, and at a distance of twelve million miles—the nearest it ever reaches—twenty miles is not large enough to measure. Finding the distance of the planet from the earth is, in fact, finding how big the earth (in diameter 8,000 miles) looks from the planet, and even this will be difficult. To measure twenty miles at the same distance is altogether out of the question.

The planet is now too faint to be seen. It may, however, be photographed; in fact, it was in this way that it was discovered. A photographic plate attached to a telescope moved by clockwork to follow the apparent diurnal motion of the stars from east to west was exposed to the sky. The stars are thus made to appear at rest, and are seen on the negative as round points. The planet, however, is moving, and appears to trail across the plate. Hundreds of minor planets have been discovered in this way, but none so remarkable as this one.

Bed-Books.

Another View.

NOT every volume, by any means, is worthy to rank as a bed-book. Clearly, to begin with, we do not want "serious reading"—a convenient, if rather vague, classification, which may be taken to include works of philosophy, history, and the like. The most ardent of bimetallists, for example, would scarce desire to read in bed a treatise on the currency question. Again, our bed-books must be light in a material sense, so that the hands can hold them without weariness. "Well, then," it is argued, "will not the ordinary novel serve the purpose?" Far from it. Indeed, I greatly doubt if any novel should be included among bed-books. For consider: if it be a slovenly, unattractive piece of work, without any special merit of construction or grace of humour, which might be just tolerable at other times, it will certainly bore you if read in bed; and you will go to your sleep in a pessimistic mood. If, on the other hand, it be above the average, it will keep you awake too long; you will resolve on "just one more chapter," and then incontinently add another to that, with the consequence of a slumber unduly curtailed, and perhaps a headache in the morning. Like any other pleasure, reading in bed must be enjoyed in wise moderation, if it is to keep its sweetness. To rank worthily as a bed-book, a novel must be extremely short, and quite free from violent sensation and "horrors"; above all, it should end happily. Might not some publisher of enterprise put forth a series expressly designed for those who read in bed? "Nightcap Novels" would serve as a title at once alliterative and apt.

But better than the novel, as a rule, is the volume of good short stories, for the simple reason that it offers the reader convenient stopping-places. According to his inclination to sleep, he can read one or half-a-dozen. The short stories should be really short; thus, The Golden Age, with its eighteen stories on 196 pages, is a better bed-book than Dream-Days, with only eight stories on 275 pages. Mr. Jacobs's volumes I find excellent for the purpose, and likewise Mr. James Payn's short stories.

But the bed-reader need not limit his choice to fiction. Essays he may read in plenty; Montaigne, Hazlitt, Lamb, and Stevenson will have charms for him quite new and distinct from those they offered when read in the garish light of day. Montaigne, indeed, might be thought to be disqualified by the length of his essays, were it not for the fact that these may be dipped into well-nigh at random with no sense of broken continuity. Verse, too, he may taste with delight, especially that of the gayer Muse; may sink to sleep with the pleasant rhythms of Austin Dobson, Fraed, or Calverley still lingering in his ears.

To catalogue one's tastes in brief is a duty from which in these days one must not decline. Here, then, by way of ending, are the six bed-books to which, were my choice unhappily restricted, I should give the preference: Across the Plains, The Golden Age, Many Cargoes, Glow-Worm Tales, The Dolly Dialogues, and Calverley's Fly-Leaves.

A. C. D.

An Experience.

T. A. H. WRITES: Apropos of "C. R.'s" remarks on bed-books, there is one book which should, I think, by no means be excluded. Some time ago, a friend who was staying with me returned home, one damp and dismal evening, very much out of humour with himself and things in general. He could not settle down to anything, and kept moving himself and the furniture about in a most aimless and nerve-grating manner. At last I suggested a hot bath, and a book in bed. He took my advice. By and by I heard, in the room above, a sound strongly resembling a stealthy chuckle, followed by an unmistakable laugh, which ended in a roar. This performance was repeated several times, and then all was silent. When I went to see how my friend was getting on, I found him peacefully slumbering, his features wearing a large, contented smile, his arms clasping a dog's-eared tome of The Anatomy of Melancholy.

A Clerical Selection.

A CLERICAL correspondent writes: Honestly, not reckoning Scripture (but St. John in Greek is good), the following are to my taste: Any of Jowett's Plato volumes, not the Jowett, but the Plato, earlier and shorter dialogues preferred, or Republic in non-continuous snatches.

Browning's Ring and the Book, anywhere except the advocate's Latin juggleries. Or the small one shilling selection of R. B.; Karshish, Cleon, or Andrea del Sarto for preference.

Anything of Pater's—Appreciations or Renaissance best.

Cur Deus Homo, translated. But part of this seems professional; and isn't the other part—odd?

A Suggestion to Publishers.

A THIRD correspondent writes: "C. R." stands aghast at the Clerk of Oxenford who read Aristotle in bed. Are we to assume from this that modern Clerks of Oxenford are incapable of the feat? And if this assumption is justified, are we to look for the cause in the fact that a Liddell and Scott does not easily lend itself to manipulation by hands thrust from beneath bed-clothes?

The scholar who reads Aristotle for mere pleasure must be the rarest of birds. But even in these degenerate days there are many scholars who could, and perhaps do, very agreeably read themselves to sleep with a Greek play or a dialogue of Plato, or even a Pindaric ode. I have an idea, however, that the number of such scholars is much smaller than it might be. There are many college graduates whose undergraduate years were chiefly spent in diligent, and perhaps distinguished, study of the classics, and who, in after years, take down their Plato or Aristophanes for an hour's desultory reading, but find that, although the structure of the language is familiar, and presents comparatively little difficulty, they are frequently stumbling upon words whose meaning has escaped their memory, or which, possibly, they have never met before. This naturally spoils their pleasure in the book, for who would keep a Liddell and Scott by his armchair or bedside? The consequence is, that their thirst for the Pierian spring must be slaked, if slaked at all, by an English decoction of it; and translations are, at best, insipid. Now, if some benevolent publisher were to give us an edition of the best Greek authors in small volumes, with tasteful typography, paper, and binding, and on the margin, or at the foot of the pages, a running glossary of all the most unusual words of the text, he would earn the gratitude of a not inconsiderable class. There should be no annotations, with the exception, possibly, of a very occasional and very concise explanation of obscure historical or typographical references; and the edition ought not to be prepared by eminent scholars, but by men of the class for whom it is intended, for they would best understand where explanations were needed.

An Old Map.

THERE lies before me a map of London issued exactly one hundred years ago. To examine it for half-an-hour is a liberal education in the growth of London in the nineteenth century. For what do we find? In this map,* published in January, 1799, by Mr. Thomas Evans, Islington is still cut off from the main body of London by green fields. The City-road is only laid out; it has no houses on it from the Angel all the way down to Old-street. Hoxton is just being enmeshed by the streets of London. The "Road to Hackney," along which trams now run, is a country lane. Vast meadow lands, intersected by a few new roads without houses, appear where now Bethnal Green and Cambridge Heath and Old Ford spread their mean streets. The Mile End-road leads nowhere but to Essex. Stepney is a village, Rotherhithe a marsh with one street winding by the river edge. Long before the great southern arteries reach the Elephant and Castle they are running through green fields and marshy lands. Chelsea is far, far away. The British Museum is backed by fields, and from Guilford-street your eye travels to the woods of Highgate.

When I had amused myself with these observations it occurred to me to discover the literary men and women who dwelt in this London of 1799, and in what streets they lived. Without difficulty I could muster about thirty writers of note to whom this map of Evans's represented the London of everyday life. Let us see who these authors were.

In 1799 the Johnson band had been thinned by death. Sir Joshua had been dead seven years, Boswell two years, Burke two years. Fanny Burney was, of course, alive. She actually lived until 1840, and could have told Macaulay how Johnson hugged her in St. Martin-street when Evelina took the town by storm. Sheridan was living in London, perhaps in Hertford-street, Mayfair, but you were pretty sure to find him with his fellow "Eccentrics" in Chandos-street. Junius (if Junius and Sir Philip Francis were the same) was housed in St. James's-square. In 1791 he wrote: "I have removed into a very convenient house in St. James's-square, where I believe I am at anchor for life. The name of the situation sounds well, but you would be much mistaken in concluding that I live in a palace."

Among elderly writers were Mrs. Barbauld and Mrs. Inchbald, the one writing moral stories at Hampstead, the other translating French plays in town. Joanna Baillie was cultivating the Muse in Great Windmill-street, Piccadilly. On the other hand, Miss Mitford was going to school at 22, Hans-place, Chelsea; in after life she described the school-house as new and blessed with a garden full of flowers. Captain Marryat was also at school, in Baker-street.

The year 1799 at once recalls Charles Lamb and his circle. Lamb, on whom the tragedy of his mother's death had rested only two years, was living in Chapel-street in rural Pentonville. His name had appeared on the little volume of poems to which Coleridge and Charles Lloyd contributed their share of verses. And here he wrote his fine poem, "Hester," in honour of Hester Savory, the young Quakeress, whom he often encountered in his walks. Coleridge, who was twenty-seven years of age in 1799, lodged in King-street, Covent Garden. Hazlitt was but twenty-one, and had not yet come to live in London, though he could be found occasionally at his brother's house in Rathbone-place. Leigh Hunt was still at the Blue Coat School in Newgate-street. Godwin, by far the most elderly of Lamb's friends, was living in Somers Town. Southey was twenty-five, but even at that age London did not attract him. "London disorders me by over-stimulation," he wrote seven years later. Exactly a century from the date of this issue of the ACADEMY, Lamb was telling Southey, by letter, that Robert Lloyd "hath eloped from the persecutions of his father," the Quaker banker of Birmingham, and sending a sample of "John Woodvil."

Wordsworth was occasionally in town at this time, but apparently not in 1799. Scott had not yet been to London; he was, in fact, attending the High School at Edinburgh. Byron was eleven years of age, and in 1799 he was brought to Sloane-terrace, Chelsea, to have his foot attended to by an eminent surgeon. Moore was twenty, and was entered at the Middle Temple, but he lived in George-street, Portman-square. Shelley was seven years of age, had not yet seen the city which he afterwards compared with Hell. Keats was four years of age, and running about Finsbury Pavement. Hood was just born in the Poultry. The most mature poet actually settled in London was Samuel Rogers. In 1799 he was thirty-six years of age, and was living in the Temple. He had gone as a boy to Bolt-court to present his youthful poems to Dr. Johnson who was then nearing his end, but the boy's heart failed him and he fled from the lexicographer's doorstep. Now, in 1799, Rogers had won a laurel-sprig or two with his Pleasures of Memory.

Of these writers many are now classics. How many writers have we within the four-mile radius who will be read in 1999?

The Contributors' Playground.

The Little Wild-Looking King.

WILL you think it worth noting that the "beautiful vision of Oberon which has charmed France for four centuries" has, in fact, charmed all lovers of poetry and romance for a much longer period? Surely the little wild-looking King, "with long golden locks and child's visage more lovely than the midsummer sun," is one of the manifestations of Merlin. It was in that form he visited Vivian, in that earliest legend from which Robert de Borron took his story; the very words are the same, and the midsummer sun marks in both the true nature of the god. Merlin visited Vivian only on St. John's Eve. But he also appeared at Arthur's court under the same form of a golden-haired child, with his golden harp also. Apollo himself become King of the Fairies—the little people of joy and laughter!

G. W.

The London Expression.

A PASSAGE in Mrs. Meynell's new volume, The Spirit of Place, and Other Essays, has greatly interested me. Mrs. Meynell is writing of Solitude, and she concludes a beautiful and suggestive essay in these words:

If there is a look of human eyes that tells of perpetual loneliness, so there is also the familiar look that is the sign of perpetual crowds. It is the London expression, and, in its way, the Paris expression. It is the quickly caught, though not interested, look, the dull but ready glance of those who do not know of their forfeited place apart; who have neither the open secret nor the close; no reserve, no need of refuge, no flight nor impulse of flight; no moods but what they may brave out in the street, no hope of news from solitary counsels.

I recognise this London expression, but would interpret it differently. To Mrs. Meynell it suggests that a vast number of London people have forgotten or have never known solitude, and—such is their unhappy state—have no desire for its privileges. I am accustomed, in my own mind, to claim great things for London, but I do not like to think that London can thus reduce human beings to mere particles of its huge self, and be to them the whole hard world. I suggest that this "London expression," so well described by Mrs. Meynell, is really the outward sign of an inward attitude of defence against the myriad and wearying calls which faces and incidents in the streets make on London people. The "dull but ready glance" which you receive from the passer-by is that share of his attention and feeling which he can afford to give you, and it is a small share because you have four million rivals.

De Quincey thought that the visions that came to him, under opium, of innumerable human faces—faces "by myriads, by generations, by centuries"—might have had their origin in his London life.

We who do not eat opium, but are London-bound, must somehow conquer or evade the tyranny of the human face. Hence this quick, dull glance—quick with the quickness of the eye, but dull with the wise dulness of a brain that would sicken in an hour's sustained alertness. Solitude denied, not solitude abdicated, I read behind the "London expression." And though the impulse of flight may be weakened by defeat is it not always there? Even in the least refined does it not glow like a spark?

Cornish Diamonds.

THERE are some capital stories, racy of the Cornish soil and seashore, in the Cornish Magazine, the first volume of which has just been issued. Before we quote some of these "Cornish Diamonds" we must express our admiration of this magazine. Edited by Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, Cornishman and man of letters, it has already gathered into its pages much curious matter connected with one of the most romantic of English counties. Cornish people, customs, history, and by-way lore, are treated of in turn. Mr. Quiller-Couch has summoned good men to his aid: Mr. W. B. Yeats and Mr. H. D. Lowry contribute poems, Mr. Baring-Gould several articles, Mr. Eden Philpotts two poems, and so on. And then there are the "Cornish Diamonds," a page of them to each month. We shall not attempt to generalise on Cornish humour (conscious or unconscious) from these specimens, for they are not yet numerous enough. But it would seem that Cornwall breeds "bulls" of a sturdier breed than Ireland. Here are a few "diamonds" from Mr. Quiller-Couch's collection:

"PLEASE God," said Aunt Mary Bunny, "if I live till this evenin', and all's well, I'll send for the doctor."

"I SHAN'T name no names," said Uncle Billy, "but Jack Tremeneheere's the man."

JOHN CARTER, the famous smuggler of Porthleah, went throughout Cornwall by the name of the "King of Prussia." A Mousehole man, on hearing news of the real King of Prussia's defeat at Jena, remarked: "Misfortunes never come single. I'm sorry for that man. Not more'n six weeks ago he lost three hundred keg o' brandy, by information, so I'm towld."

ALL the crew had been saved, but one poor fellow was brought ashore unconscious. The curate turned to the bystanders:

"How do you proceed in the case of one apparently drowned?"

"S'arch his pockets."

CHAIRMAN OF PARISH COUNCIL: "What? You keep us here till nine o'clock at night and then cast the town drains in our teeth? You keep us here ploughin' the san's, and then, at nine o'clock at night, you drag in that everlastin' red herrin' and expect us to swaller it? You rake up a motion that was carried non com at the last mittin', and away you go into the public drains, causing unnecessary friction. 'Tis too barefaced to hold water."

A PEDLAR, having lost his way on a Cornish moor at night, rode up to a cottage and tapped with his whip at a bedroom window.

"Can you tell me the way to Redruth?"

"Who's theer, stankin' down my lil liks and lil taties?"

"I've lost my way to Redruth."

"Where be comin' from?"

"From Liverpool."

"What be goin' to Redruth for?"

"To sell needles and pins."

"Niddles an' pins! Niddles an' pins. Come all the way from Liverpool to sell niddles an' pins. Go's 'long with 'ee, stankin down my lil liks and lil taties!"

Our final example would alone justify the existence of the Cornish Magazine:

A WEST-COUNTRY squire on his death-bed was visited by the parson.

"You are going to a better world," said the Parson.

"I don't want no better world. With my white-faced mare and a thousand a year I don't want no better world. Her'd go over gates one arter t'other—tip—tip—tip."

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THIS week three of the less prominent men of letters were decorated: François de Curel, Georges Courteline, and Georges d'Espèrès. François de Curel is a young and original dramatist, audacious, but not at all of the rosse school. Social problems engage his fancy as well as the eternal theme, and he is said to have tried his hand at philanthropy before introducing it on the stage. The hero of the Repas du Lion, in distributing a large share of his wealth among his workmen, only did what M. de Curel himself had previously done. His best piece is L'Invitée. Georges Courteline is the modern expression of French gaiety. He is implacably gay, like our own new humorists with wit and intellect thrown in. There is a large, coarse humour about his realistic military stories which carries off their grossness, and makes them excruciatingly funny and, at the same time, terribly true. Laughing loudly, he seizes with ferocious justice all the iniquities, the baseness, and stupidity of military despotism. If Europe ever disarms, and barrack-life in times of peace should fall into a state of legend or historical study, the stories of Courteline will read like a laughable nightmare. Georges d'Espèrès is a military writer of another quality. He glories in banners and flags, and trumpets and bayonets. His dream is a France ever on the march, ever defying Europe to deadly fray, with her officers always in coquettish array and the pink of gallantry. Not for worlds would he recognise any of the drawbacks of military life. 'Tis, in his opinion, the only life worth living. His is the romance, Courteline's is the realism of martial law. His style is anything but impeccable; indeed, he can hardly be said to have any style at all, but such tales as those which comprise the attractive volume Guerre en Dentelles (from which was taken the story translated for the ACADEMY, "The Honours of Death"), are of an alluring brightness and gallantry—crâne is the French word that best expresses their delightful spirit.

Since the appearance of Ramuntcho, no such thing as a pleasing French novel has been published until to-day, when M. René Bazin's most fresh and charming Terre qui Meurt comes to us as an immense surprise. Not for nothing has M. Bazin been a careful and admiring student of George Eliot. Here is a book to place on one's shelf between Silas Marner and La Petite Fadette, and greater praise of a simple tale of humble folk than this no one to-day can bestow. La Terre qui Meurt has every old-fashioned quality we have, alas! learnt to regret: gentleness, distinction, delicate pathos, simplicity, and lucidity of diction, that fragrance which is the charm of easy grace and supreme honesty. This is the sort of story that breeds affection for the author in the breast of the reader. You never stop to think what a dreadfully clever fellow he is, but every moment you say what a good, what a kindly, what a sweet nature! In the midst of all the brilliant pornography, the ferocious and venomous wit, literary scandal-mongering, dull psychology, it comes to us like a perfumed breeze blown to us from the dear remembered hillsides of our youth; like the living ghost of almost forgotten joys and dead dreams. Imagine Washington Irving in a group composed of Henri Lavedan, Gyp, Paul Hervieu, Marcel Prévost, Abel Hermant, and you may have some notion of the contrast of La Terre qui Meurt with modern French novels.

Here are accents of tender and faithful love we have long ceased to be familiar with in French prose. Rousille, the farmer's daughter, loves the farm-lad her despotic father has just dismissed because of this love. She, in her sorrow, goes to see two kindly old maids who have adopted her as a sort of niece. The scene is very pretty and touching:

"Little one, you are in grief, you have wept. Tell me, my Rousille, what is it?"

"They have sent away Jean Nesumg," she said.

"He, dear? such a good workman? Why?"

"Because I love him. They dismissed him this morning. And they believe that it is all over between us because I shall not see him again. Ah, no! They don't understand the girls here. I will give them all my money, yes, gladly. But my friendship, where I have placed it I will leave it. It is sworn like my baptism. I am not afraid of poverty; I am not afraid he will forget me. The day he returns, for he promised he would return, I will go to meet him. No one will prevent me. If there were the whole Marais to cross in a yawl, and snow and ice, and all the girls of the village to jeer at me, and my father and brothers to prevent, I still would go."

Standing, irritated, she cast her love and her rancour against the walls of that room, unaccustomed to hear high words. She spoke for herself, for herself alone, because she suffered. She looked before her, vaguely, without thinking of Michelonne. Yet the latter had risen. She listened, her whole body shaken and lifted up, so seized by Rousille's words, so carried away, and beyond her limited circle of thoughts, that the peace of her visage had vanished, and a woman looked forth from the eyes of the old maid oppressed by life, a woman who remembered and found youth again in the suffering of another: "You are right, little one. I approve of you. Love him well."

Rousille at these words dropped her glance on Michelonne, and had the revelation of a being unknown to her. There was a flame in the eyes; the poor arms full of rheumatism were stretched toward Rousille, and trembled from emotion.

"Yes, love him dearly. Your happiness is in him. Let time act, but don't yield, my Rousille, for I know of others who in youth refused to marry to please their father, and who afterwards found it so hard a pain to kill their heart! Don't live alone, it's worse than death. I know your Jean. Your Jean and you are such as now are rare in the land; and if the old aunt can serve you, defend you, give you wherewithal to start in life, come to me, child, come to me."

And she held Rousille in her embrace, bent over her black bodice; and Rousille, now that she had said everything, let herself go in tears.

Space forbids me to say more of this delightful story than to recommend it as something strong and delicate, tender and restrained, a noble, a poignant, and a truthful study of peasant life.

Things Seen.

A Confession of Faith.

It was the night of the great gale. In the usual mid-night altercation at Piccadilly-circus for the inside seats of omnibuses we had suffered defeat; we sat on the inclement top of the vehicle, a disconsolate row of four, cowering behind the waterproof aprons (which were not waterproof), and exchanging fragments of pessimistic philosophy. We knew we were taking cold; at first we wore annoyed, but with increasing numbness came resignation. We grew calm enough to feel an interest in the imperturbable driver, who nonchalantly and with perfect technique steered his dogged horses through the tortuous mazes of traffic, never speaking, never stirring, only answering like an automaton to the conductor's bell. Some drivers will gossip, but this one had apparently his own preoccupations. We could see only his hat, some grey hairs, his rotund cape, and his enormous gloved hands; and perhaps we began to wonder what sort of man he was. For mile after mile he drove forward in a Trappist silence, till we were verging upon Putney, and the rain-washed thoroughfares reflected only the gaslights and the forbidding façades of the houses.

Then at last, but without moving his head, he suddenly joined the conversation.

"I've been out in worse," he said. "Yes, we gets used to it. But we gets so that we has to live out of doors. If I got a' indoor job I should die. I have to go out for a walk afore I can eat my breakfast."

A pause, and then:

"I've driven these roads for eight-and-twenty year, and the only pal I've found is Cod Liver Oil. From September to March I takes it, and I never has rheumatism and I never has colds nor nothing o' that sort. I give it my children ever since they was born, and now I'm blest if they don't cry for it."

He finished; he had imparted his wisdom, delivered his message, and with the fine instinct denied to so many literary artists, he knew when to be silent. We asked him to stop, and he did so without a word. "Good night," we said; but he had done with speech for that evening, and gave us no reply. We alighted. The 'bus rolled away into the mirror-like vista of the street.

A Find.

My edition of the Spectator is the eighth, "Printed for F. Tonson at Shakespeare's-Head, over-against Katherine-street in the Strand, MDCCLXXVI," but it lacked the first volume. It is wonderful how constantly one meets with stray volumes of the Spectator; but in my case it was never the volume that I wanted.

One evening I came upon a bookshop, or rather stall—for the window was glassless, and the serried lines of shabby books lay open to the street.

A white ticket proclaiming the magic word "Spectator—sevenpence" caught my eye. With trembling hands and a curious sense of premonition I lifted it out from the grim grammars and text-books that surrounded it. One of its calf boards was loose and fell with a clatter on the pavement; but what cared I? for it was the first volume, and of my edition.

I hastened into the shop—not, however, without a sense of shame that I should tender so base a sum as sevenpence in payment of this long-sought treasure.

A keen-eyed, grey-whiskered, genial little man, aproned as from some handicraft, met me. There was something sympathetic to his environment in his appearance, and I could not forbear the remark: "I've been looking for this book for years, and I feel as though you had made me a much longed-for present."

I held out towards him the poor, shabby little book, with its loose calf board.

The man's eager, grey face lit up. "Ah," he said—and there was infinite understanding in his "ah"—"I'll tell you what it is, sir, they write a deal faster nowadays; but they don't take such pains. They don't take such pains to say exactly what they mean."

"THERE is a line in 'A Vagrant Heart,' by Miss Dora Sigerson, that must strike an echo in the heart of many a woman—'Alas! to be a woman and the nomad's heart in me.' 'The Kine of My Father' is pre-eminently a Celtic poem:

The kine of my father, they are straying from my keeping;
The young goat's at mischief, but little can I do;
For all through the night did I hear the Banshee keening;
O youth of my loving, and is it well with you?"

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE terms on which Mr. John Morley has undertaken the Gladstone biography have naturally been the subject of a good deal of surmise. I should not mind adventuring a guess that the handsome fee of £10,000 has been decided upon—indeed, has been already paid over—for the arduous and honourable task that Mr. Morley has undertaken.

So far from separating Mr. Morley from his constituency, the writing of the Life will bring him more than ever into touch with it if he takes a house near Montrose in which to get to his herculean labour. It is London that will lose him, and Westminster itself that may henceforth rank him no more among her most industrious of legislators. The "Conservative M.P." who gave us the other evening in the Pall Mall Gazette the best sketch of Mr. Morley the Parliamentarian we have yet had may no longer have the same constant opportunities of observing the orator who, in a posture that is not Demosthenic, "alternately studies his notes and directs a perplexed stare into vacancy," as if he were "a tame jackdaw inspecting a marrow-bone and blankly dismayed to find so little on it." He is not one of the members whose name, when it appears on the glorified tape-machine in the smoking-room as the speaker who has newly risen, at once causes a rush into the House. But he is a member who, all the same, will be much missed from St. Stephen's, even though it be from a seat below the Opposition gangway by the side of Sir William Harcourt.

CARDINAL VAUGHAN is to have a new bishop auxiliary, and he has gone beyond the bounds of his own diocese for his new future colleague. Possibly it is another and a subtle evidence of the Imperialist or military mood of the nation that the new prelate is an army chaplain—"best beloved of army chaplains," says Mr. George Steevens—the Rev. Robert Brindle. Father Brindle was specially mentioned in Sir H. Kitchener's despatches for his services to the wounded at the battle of Omdurman, and only some technical difficulty prevented his receiving a knighthood at the end of the campaign. Had that come about there would have been a Bishop Sir Robert Brindle, a military knight in a mitre, a unique combination of offices and decorations, yet one that is quite in accordance with the spirit of the nation and the time. As it is, he will probably be called the Tommy Atkins Bishop, and will be famous accordingly.

LADY COLERIDGE has returned from the country this week to her house in Hyde Park Gate. It is understood that some welcome memorials of the late Lord Chief Justice are sooner or later to be expected from her own editorial hands.

THERE is no truth in the statement someone has circulated, that Miss Frances Forbes-Robertson is the author of the historical play about to be produced by her brother, Mr. Norman Forbes-Robertson. The hero of the piece, the Man with the Iron Mask himself, wears not a more impenetrable vizor than that which the real author of the piece is anxious to assume.

MRS. DU MAURIER is on her way to Cape Town, a voyage which it is hoped will greatly benefit her health. Cape Town has its own literary associations, and it knows how to rate the native novels, and especially the novel of Miss Olive Schreiner; but Mrs. du Maurier will find plenty of traces of Trilby even at the end of her two or three weeks' journey from London. Similarly Lady Butler, who sails next month, will find engravings of her pictures in the shop-windows there as familiarly as in our own Strand, and there she will herself take advantage of the fine climate, and of the comparative freedom from social duties that were particularly binding at Dover, to pursue her art. At this moment she is finishing, in London, a picture which she hopes to leave behind for exhibition at the next Academy, and which she ranks among all her pictures as the most satisfactory to herself.

MR. GEORGE AITCHISON, R.A., is a lecturer to whose discourses on architecture even laymen can listen and not be bored. Most at home in the halls of his own Royal Academy, he is also at his ease among the Royal British Architects, and is able to assure them cheerfully on a gala-night gathering—such as last Monday's—that the wheel of fortune has dragged architecture into the mud. Amid many glooms, however, Mr. George Aitchison (who as a despiser of Gothic architecture is out of sympathy with the revival that has marked the greatest triumphs of our time) is able to reflect with satisfaction that Sir Christopher Wren once lived to be the nearest approach to an architect possessing all the qualifications of greatness, a sort of Shakespeare in his own profession. Mr. Aitchison had another cause of satisfaction—the last you might expect from a bachelor—in the Institute's admission of ladies to its associateship.

MR. GEORGE AITCHISON was an attached friend of Lord Leighton, whose house in Holland-park-road he designed, and the tiles of whose Arab Hall he helped to range in their present patterns. But Lord Leighton was the friend of many. Browning used even to complain that he was nearly equally the friend of all. Among the friendships of Mr. George Aitchison the most memorable, therefore, is that which unites his name to a man of genius whose friends were of the fewest—Mr. George Mason, A.R.A. It must sometimes have been a distress to the architect to think that his painter friend received his earliest impressions of life in Wetley Abbey, the Gothicised house of his father—a potter of renown. Turning the tables on Pugin, who practically refused to believe in the sanctity of anyone who worshipped in a classic church, Mason had survived this influence, and had not even succumbed to a spell of surgery in Birmingham when, at the age of twenty-seven, he went to Italy, free to wander, free to paint, and (for his father lost his riches) free also to starve. It was at this period—a Bohemian one in every good sense of the word—that the friendship of Mr. Aitchison must have counted much with him, how much can be realised only by those who have heard the survivor's particularly interesting reminiscences. "Solitude," says Cowley, "can be well-fitted and set right upon very few persons"; and George Mason was not one of these. Later in life, with his Associateship of the Academy, friends came in numbers: a happy home with wife and children at Hammersmith; Leighton, Dante Rossetti, and Frederick Walker as comrades. They, too, are all gone, except Mr. George Aitchison, who lives to lecture pessimistically, and might yet live to be that very desirable being, Mason's biographer.

MR. SWINBURNE has just lost a sister, Miss Charlotte Jane Swinburne, who died at her house in Onslow-square. Admiral and Lady Jane Swinburne had six children in all, four daughters and two sons, of whom the eldest, the poet, was born in the year Queen Victoria began to reign. His only brother, who married a lady of Berlin, died eight years ago, and another of his sisters, Alice, has been dead for nearly forty years. Among Mr. Swinburne's near relations are, strange to say, certain Roman Catholic priests—Father Sebastian Bowden, of the Oratory, and his brother, being the poet's first cousins. Another first cousin, the Earl of Ashburnham, is a convert to the Roman Catholic religion—a religion which all the Swinburnes professed until the beginning of this century.

Correspondence.

Publisher and Public: An American Method of Distribution.

SIR,—In the ACADEMY for December 17, which has just reached us, we find a paragraph referring to the American publishers of Mr. Alfred Ollivant's new story—called in England Owd Bob, and in this country Bob, Son of Battle—commenting upon the fact that we send the book to anyone “on approval,” to be paid for if satisfactory or returned, and drawing the deduction that this “method is yet another cut at the retail trade.” As this does us an injustice, and is entirely foreign to our plan, we trust that you will be willing to allow us to state the exact facts.

We not only send Mr. Ollivant's book out “on approval,” but we offer to send any of our publications on this same plan. It is, however, not aimed at the retail trade, but quite the contrary. In this country—as you, no doubt, know—there is a very large class of book-lovers who are not within reach of book-stores. It is to appeal to these readers that we some months ago started our plan of sending out books by mail. The result is, that we are sending from 600 to 1,400 volumes a day to individual buyers all over the country, who pay full retail prices, and the majority of whom are in the country districts. This system, which we started less than a year ago, has become so successful that a considerable part of the editions which we publish are sold in this way to direct subscribers. Of Mr. Kipling's new book, The Day's Work, for instance, which we publish in this country, we are just now printing the sixty-first thousand, which we understand is even a larger number than have been sold in England up to this time. If the book has sold more in this country than in England, one of the chief reasons is because our method reaches the people who are not convenient to book-stores. To say that this is “another cut at the retail trade,” as you will see under these circumstances, is, we think, quite unfair, as we sell entirely for the full price; whereas not one bookseller in a hundred charges more than 80 per cent. on the retail price.—We are, &c.,

“The Golden Girl.”

SIR,—I must ask you to be kind enough to correct your last week's paragraph in regard to a stage-version of The Quest of the Golden Girl. I have not adapted my book as stated, nor do I intend doing so; but I have agreed to the suggestion of my friends, Mr. Mostyn Piggott and Mr. Ranger Gull, that they should adapt it under my supervision.—I am, &c.,

The Country of “The Forest Lovers.”

SIR,—On reading The Forest Lovers lately, I was struck by the character of its place-names. Apart from a few like Morgraunt and Marvilion, which might have come straight out of Malory, they mostly recall the south of England, especially the New Forest. Many real names are but thinly disguised, and one or two not at all, such as Market Basing and Cadman, which is a hamlet a few miles north of Lyndhurst. Castle Malwood gives Malbank, Boldre becomes Goltres, and Mark Ash appears as Martle Brush. Beaulieu Abbey is represented by Hauterine and Gracedieu. Matley Bog becomes personal in Matt-o'-the-Moor. Thornyhold is typical of many real names, such as Holly Hatch, Bramble Hill, or Brockenhurst. As for Starning and Parrox, they are plainly in the South Down country. “The deep lanes, the woods and pastures, the grassy spaces of the Downs”—it is an exact description; and Sussex is full of such names as Starning. Here, no doubt, it stands for Steyning, and Parrox is probably Parham, a village about six miles to the westward.

It seems, therefore, that Mr. Hewlett is also among the localisers, and with his knights and shepherds is invading Wessex with a bold front. “Properate vias ejus!” as Master Porges has it.—I am, &c.,

A Little Mistake.

SIR,—Surely in Art one may be allowed to stray a little way from the lamp arrangements of railway companies. Both red and green lights must form a part of everyone's mental conception of a railway at night; in referring to lights one naturally chooses from the possible colours those most in sympathy with the emotion of the moment.

I am sorry to learn that my emotions have transgressed against the regulations of the Board of Trade—or whoever may determine what colours the lamps are to be—but such a pretty sentence of satire has been drawn from A. G. D. that I am consoled.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 16. Books That Are Wanted.

LAST week we asked for the best suggestion for one or more books which do not exist, but which ought to exist. We have received numerous replies; but, speaking frankly, we do not think that many of the suggestions offered will attract publishers. After full consideration we have decided that the best suggestions are those of Mr. J. W. Feaver, of Elmstone Lodge, Dagmar-road, South Norwood, S.E., and Miss F. L. Paterson, 16, Greencoat-mansions, Westminster.

These competitors have suggested the same work in different terms. Mr. Feaver formulates his need as follows:

A skeleton History of the World, upon which one could gradually build up a full conception of history and see every period in perspective. A boy after going through his school "England" may still be uncertain whether William the Conqueror was a contemporary of Charlemagne or Tancred, &c. As his reading extends he may arrive at a comprehensive idea of history, but why not start with a skeleton history of the world.

Miss Paterson's suggestion is:

A Contemporaneous History, giving a bird's-eye view of historical events, &c., taking place all over the earth's surface at the same time from earliest days.

To these two competitors cheques for half-a-guinea have been sent.

Below we print a selected list of the suggestions which we consider to be valuable or interesting:

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

The Cure of Self and the Care of Souls. A book of counsels to the clergy of all denominations. This has been done almost, but never quite, because its brilliant writers have said some things they need not to have said, but chiefly have not said some they ought. Such a book must be absolutely frank as to all departments of ministerial work, addressing ministers as men and students; also as guides, reprovers, friends, and soothers of men. It must try to tell a minister how not to make a fool of himself, as well as how to suffer fools gladly, how to deal with rogues, cads, penitents, the hungry, and—boys. It will have to know what to say about games as well as prayers, about secret vice and public worship, and all with simple, guarded honesty. I think I know a man who could write this book if he had only the time and—the brains.

[J. J. P., Oswestry.]

A book the antithesis of Robert Elsmere, bright, lucid, clever, showing knowledge of patristic lore, both orthodox and heterodox, revealing both sides, yet Christian.

LITERATURE, ART, DRAMA.

(1) Literary Criticism: its History and Development. There is no such volume, though many fragments are to be found in all quarters. Consideration should preferably be limited to English work, using foreign as side-lights.

(2) George Eliot: a Biography and Criticism. Cross's "Life" is no life; and there is no study (except in the Dictionary of National Biography) worth naming.

[F. S., Belfast.]

(1) Biographies (collected in one volume) of those Contributors to Periodical Literature whose writings have never been collected in book form.

(2) The Feminine Element in Literature. A work dealing with (a) Female Writers; (b) Writers mainly influenced by the feminine element in life.

[D. F. H., Dublin.]

A History of Realism in Literature, Music, and the Fine Arts.

[H. O., London, S.E.]

(1) A book on the Dialects of the English Language, as spoken in all parts of the Anglo-Saxon world.

(2) A book on the Dialect of the London Lower Classes.

(3) A book on the Sense of the Ridiculous, and the defects of character arising from its absence.

(4) A book in the manner of Lavater on the expression of the Emotions, illustrated by many different artists.

[A. M., Clapham Common.]

Greek Gods in English Settings. An anthology of tales of Greek gods and heroes from English authors (poets chiefly), not mere allusions, but complete passages or poems, such as Keats's "Ode on a Grecian Urn."

[H. J. W., Tonbridge.]

The Idylls of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, done into verse. The last idyll of M. has been versified by Mr. Ernest Myers. There is surely a field here for our young poets.

[C. E. F., London, N.W.]

A History of Plot in the English Novel.

[T. B. D., Bridgwater.]

A Kipling Bibliography. The "collected edition" of Mr. Kipling's works is far from complete, and it is difficult to obtain information about many important fragments.

[F. C. W., Southwark, S.E.]

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, &c.

(1) An Illustrated History of the Pre-historic Iron Age in Europe.

(2) A series of British County Books, each giving a new architectural and archaeological account of all the parish churches.

[W. G. S., Dunstable.]

The Monuments and Statues of London: How, When, Where, and To Whom Erected.

[Ignotus, London, S.E.]

(1) An Early Irish History on the lines of Freeman's Early English History, written with all modern enlightenment as to the writing of history, and yet an interesting reading book for the young.

(2) The Making of the Anglo-Saxon. "Norman and Saxon and Dane are we," but we know little of the early history of these races, the old Northmen and the Teutonic tribes of Central Europe who built on the ruins of the Roman Empire.

A History of Ideas.

[C. E. F., London, N.W.]

A History of Modern Daily Journalism. A most fascinating manual of some 450 pages might be written by someone behind the scenes, I am sure.

[E. R. F., Sunderland.]

A History of Paris. Treating the subject, of course, historically, socially, architecturally, &c. (but what is especially needed in the present crisis in order that we may better understand the French nation), from the point of view that Paris is France.

[M. T. P., Chester.]

Towns' Records. A library edition of a series of books dealing with towns' records.

[D. F. C., Hull.]

(1) A good History of the American Civil War.

(2) A Modern History of India beginning in, say, 1850 or 1858, showing in detailed and scientific form the various improvements, moral and material, that have taken place in India from that period to the present day.

[A. K. G., Kew Gardens.]

A History of Sweden. There is no such history in English, French, or German.

[E. B., London, W.]

(1) The Origin of the Legendary History of the Saints, showing to what extent Buddhist and other Oriental legend and folk-lore have been appropriated by Christian tradition. No such inquiry has appeared.

(2) A Life of Bishop Lightfoot, with a preliminary essay on the "Cambridge Movement" in theology.

(3) Their Honour Rooted in Dishonour Stood, or the Fight of the Devil's Own with the Prisoner of the Devil's Isle, by M. Zola.

[H. T. F., Caius College, Cambridge.]

The Hundred Worst Books. From a literary rather than a moral standpoint, and to be confined to books that are popular, but worthless.

[H. T. F., Caius College, Cambridge.]

The Role of Woman in Thought and Literature. Innumerable books exist on the History of Women, Women's Rights, Evolution of Sex, &c, but apparently not one exists which passes in review or summarises the attitude of the great authors of the world, or even of the majority of authors of any given period or people, with regard to woman. Nor is there any attempt at classification or comparison of the heroines of literature, or of ideals of womanhood. What is wanted is a comparative study of the different points of view from which the "eternal feminine" has been regarded by the great thinkers and writers of the world.

SCIENCE, NATURAL HISTORY, ETC.

A book on Insects. The books now available generally tell us that such and such a work gives the anatomy, and that so and so explains the habits, but I think a good deal might be compressed into one decent volume. The Cambridge Natural History comes nearer the mark, but only parts of it are out, and these are 17s. each. If I want a good book on Beetles where is it to be found?

[R. J. F., Leeds.]

Trees, Shrubs, and Bushes, Native and Foreign, Found in a Wild State in Great Britain and Ireland. This book should enable one to identify the trees and shrubs; as a fern-lover I have found it easy to supply my literary needs, but I have found that neither money nor research can provide the book I have named.

[O. F., Baildon, Yorks.]

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

A book which would supply the names of authors, and brief abstracts from their works, who have dealt with subjects that have stirred the reading world during Decennial Periods in the Nineteenth Century, and during longer periods in earlier centuries.

[W. P., St. Albans.]

A book of Genealogical Trees, giving the pedigrees and connexions of all those people whom everybody ought to know about. As: Royal Houses, the Grenvilles and Pitts, the Bentincks and Cannings, the Kingsleys, the Wordsworths, the Arnolds. Such a book would supply information on short notice which could otherwise only be obtained by search in a very complete library.

[G. H., Glasgow.]

An Annual Volume on Costume, so illustrated by the best draughtsmen and by photographs that future artists may have something more than fashion plates to refer to.

[A. M., Clapham Common.]

A Comprehensive Index to the Patent Library: Subject Matter. A long felt want.

[D. F. C., Hull.]

A Dictionary of English Place Names. [H. A. E., Begbroke.]

A periodical publication (probably monthly) giving a summary or explanation of the principal events dealt with in the newspapers of the day—e.g., the taking over of the Soudan, the late Transvaal war, the Druce case, &c; or, generally, a brief reference to the previous circumstances affecting present topics.

[F. L. P., Westminster.]

Calendar of Deeds in Private Hands. On the lines of the Historical MSS. Commission Reports. [F. B. B., London, N.W.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Repose: its Beauty, and How to Cultivate It. A Word to the Restless.

[M. L., Chester.]

(1) The Art and Industry of Brushmaking. With a History of the Trade from the Earliest Times.

(2) A Manual of Street Decorations. For the use of Municipal Bodies.

[F. C. W., Southwark, S.E.]

The Footsteps of London: an Account of its People in the Present Day.

[A. B. C., Upper Norwood, S.E.]

The Perfect Book. Containing a description of the most perfect thing of its kind in every department of progress, art, science, literature, &c., with diagrams and illustrations. The decision on each subject to be made by a committee of authority.

[X., Dorchester.]

We have received many other replies to this competition.

Competition No. 17.

IN another column of this issue of the ACADEMY will be found an article introducing a series of Cornish stories. We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best local anecdote that is sent to us. The anecdotes should be short and pithy; they must have a distinct local flavour; but neither by excessive nor obscure dialect, nor by any other local characteristic, must they be beyond the understanding or enjoyment of those who are unacquainted with the districts to which they relate.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, January 31. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 140. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

* * * Owing to the exceptional pressure on our space, the "Academy" Bureau is held over.

FATHER BARRY'S NEW NOVEL.

THE TWO STANDARDS. By W.

BARRY, D.D. In green cloth, 6s.

"Powerful and dramatic.... Father Barry's knowledge of men and things is like Ibsen's, deep.... The book is powerful and interesting.... Father Barry has the gift of graphic and vivid narrative."—Daily News.

"The most remarkable novel that the last three months have produced.... from beginning to end a deep and powerful study as from the life, finely and truly drawn."—Westminster Gazette.

THE AUTHOR OF "GULLIVER'S TRAVELS."

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS of DEAN

SWIFT. Edited by GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., LL.D., Honorary Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford. Illustrated, demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

"A most valuable and interesting volume.... a very readable book and a useful work of reference."—Manchester Guardian.

"The volume has been admirably edited."—Daily News.

"The book is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of a great career."—Leeds Mercury.

THE BUILDERS OF GREATER BRITAIN.

LORD CLIVE: the Foundation of British Rule in India. By Sir A. J. ARBUTHNOT, K.C.S.I.

BY JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P.

MODERN ENGLAND. Before the Reform Bill. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. (A New Volume of "The Nation Series.") Many Illustrations. Cloth, 5s.

"Written with all the charm and picturesqueness which Mr. McCarthy can bring to the treatment of historical details, it forms an excellent book on popular lines to place in the hands of the rising generation."—Scotsman.

"A book which, unlike most existing histories of the period, avoids the charge of tediousness.... Will add to Mr. McCarthy's admirers in literature."—Daily Chronicle.

A NOVEL OF MEDICAL LIFE BY A NEW WRITER

HARRY INGLEBY: Surgeon. By

FREDERIC J. WEBB. Cloth, 6s. [Next week.]

The life-history of a young doctor, describing his student days, his friendships, his love-story, and his East-End practice.

FIFTH EDITION.

EUPHORION: being Studies of the Antique and the Medieval in the Renaissance. By VERNON LEE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Delightful and scholarly.... The book, indeed, a fascinating throughout."—Graphic.

A ROMANCE OF THE YORKSHIRE MOORS.

RICROFT of WITHENS. By Halli-

WELL SUTCLIFFE, Author of "A Man of the Moors." Cloth, 6s.

"What 'Lorna Doone' is to Exmoor, so 'Ricroft of Withens' should be for that part of the Yorkshire moorlands in which the scene of the story is laid.... The story is a powerful one and powerfully told. There is not a dull chapter in it, and the dramatic events hurry on with a fateful energy which makes it almost impossible to put the book down until it is finished to the last word.... Certainly one of the strongest books of the last year."—Westminster Gazette.

"It is a story that is full of vigour and life."—Speaker.

"A capital story.... the book may be heartily recommended to those who love drinking and fighting scenes and the play of those elementary passions, love and revenge.... [Mr. Sutcliffe] has two essentials of a good novel-writer, a fine insight into character and an independent outlook. Nor do these exhaust his merits.... He has the art of narration."—Academy.

"Should win for Mr. Sutcliffe a high place among our foremost living novelists."—Yorkshire Herald.

"A stirring story of romance and adventure. In style reminding us of Mr. S. R. Crockett, 'Ricroft of Withens' is just the sort of story which that author would love to tell.... The book abounds in strong and moving passage, which genuinely hold the reader."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is by way rather of high praise than of captious comparison that we say that in reading Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe's last romance we are irresistibly reminded of 'Lorna Doone.' As Mr. Buckmoore, by no means unknown to him, overpowers the reader's sense with the odours and sounds and lonely distances of Exmoor, so has Mr. Sutcliffe with a sure touch treated the same phenomena of the Yorkshire moors.... We turn to the many excellencies of this truly remarkable book—its grip, its vehemence, its bold characterisation, its fertility of incident, its power of sustained description, its scholarly style, its atmosphere, its romantic realism, and only regret that space does not allow us to deal with them more fully. In hard fighting of the grim and gory kind that Stevenson and Kingsley loved, Mr. Sutcliffe is a master."—Literary World.

"A very vigorous tale."—Yorkshire Post.

"A book that will be read, talked of, and universally admired."—Aberdeen Free Press.

NEW BOOK BY SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN.

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Part I, 1766-1776. By the Right Hon. SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, Bart., Author of "The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay" and "The Early History of Charles James Fox," 8vo, 16s.

"Nowhere are contemporaneous events on both sides of the Atlantic which accelerated the catastrophe more clearly brought out than in this volume. Here and there are brilliant sketches of men and manners, and terse epigrammatic sayings, recalling pages, and these by no means the least effective, of the author's illustrious uncle."—Times.

THE GREAT CAMPAIGNS of NELSON. By WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS, M.A. Illustrated from Capt. Mahan's "Sea Power," and with a Portrait of Lord Nelson. 3s. 6d.

The Times says:—"The articles are clearly and attractively written, and the author has studied with intelligence the leading authorities on his subject, especially Capt. Mahan, who has placed at his disposal some of the maps and diagrams employed in his own works on 'Sea Power.'"

SKETCHES of the GREEK DRAMATIC POETS. By C. HAINES KEENE, M.A., Professor of Greek in Queen's College, Cork. 3s. 6d.

 Five Lectures on Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Aristophanes, and the Classical and Romantic Drama. The Irish Times says:—"Such lectures as these will be perused by all scholars with sincere pleasure. They give life to the dry bones of old history and literature, and vastly illuminate a classic period from which all the art of the modern world has derived its inspiration. A book which will teach every reader of it to think. Alike in point of learning and of reflection, its chapters are excellent, and we commend them to the attention of all students of letters."

LANDMARKS in ENGLISH INDUSTRIAL HISTORY. By GEORGE TOWNSEND WARNER, M.A., sometime Scholar of Jesus College, Cambridge. 5s.

The purpose of this book is to give an idea of the main features of our Economic History, and to show the continuity and far-reaching consequences of certain events and policies upon the development of England's Industrial Wealth and Power.

THE SCIENCE of LIFE. By J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A. ("Victorian Era Series.") 2s. 6d.

HORACE.—The ODES. Book I. Edited by STEPHEN GWYNNE, B.A., late Scholar and Hulsean Exhibitioner of Brasenose College, Oxford. Illustrated. 1s. 6d.

The Speaker says:—"The introduction on Horace and his work is very pleasantly written. The translations offered are characterised by literary sense and poetical feeling combined with accurate scholarship. The notes are judicious and sound; they seem to reveal the practised teacher. Text, notes, and vocabulary are all clearly printed. On the whole, we have here a text-book distinctly in advance, both scholastically and pedagogically, of the majority of school-books, and withal at the very reasonable price of 1s. 6d."

CICERO.—The FIRST CATILINE ORATION. Book I. Edited by C. HAINES KEENE, M.A., Professor of Greek in Queen's College, Cork. Illustrated. 1s. 6d.

Part I. EXERCISES on the FIRST THREE BOOKS of EUCLID. 1s.
 Part II. MORE DIFFICULT EXERCISES on the FIRST FOUR BOOKS, and EXERCISES on BOOK VI. 2s.

The Guardian says:—"Mr. Dilworth has in it skilfully arranged and collected in a handy form some of the best-known and oftentimes-quoted extra propositions, given usually in odd corners of text-books of Euclid. The notes at the end of the Second Book are worthy of study."

LAYNG'S ARITHMETIC. By A. E. LAYNG, M.A., Editor of "Layng's Euclid."

With or without ANSWERS, 1s. 6d.
 The Journal of Education says:—"The examples are extremely numerous. It would be difficult to suggest any point in which they might be extended or improved. The treatment of the theory of arithmetic is detailed, and at the same time clear and interesting."

The Literary Week.

LORD ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL'S proposal to perpetuate William Black's memory, by placing a lifeboat bearing his name in some station in the West Highlands, seems to us a very fitting and excellent one. We shall be glad to receive subscriptions to this end, and forward them to the Editor of The Oban Times, who, we understand, has the matter in hand.

THE February issue of Scribner's Magazine contains the second instalment of Robert Louis Stevenson's letters. Written in his twenty-fifth year, mainly from Edinburgh, they are stimulating and delightful reading. We shall return to them next week. Meanwhile, we quote a passage giving an account of his first meeting with Mr. W. E. Henley:

Yesterday, Leslie Stephen, who was down here [at Edinburgh] to lecture, called on me and took me up to see a poor fellow, a poet who writes for him, and who has been eighteen months in our infirmary, and may be, for all I know, eighteen months more. It was very sad to see him there, in a little room with two beds, and a couple of sick children in the other bed. A girl came in to visit the children and played dominoes on the counterpane with them; the gas flared and crackled, the fire burned in a dull, economical way; Stephen and I sat on a couple of chairs, and the poor fellow sat up in his bed with his hair and beard all tangled, and talked as cheerfully as if he had been in a king's palace, or the great King's palace of the blue air. He has taught himself two languages since he has been lying there. I shall try to be of use to him.

In this connexion we may recall the impression Stevenson made on Mr. Henley when he visited him in the Edinburgh Hospital:

APPARITION.

Thin-legged, thin-chested, slight unspeakably,
Neat-footed and weak-fingered: in his face—
Lean, large-boned, curved of beak, and touched with race,
Bold-lipped, rich-tinted, mutable as the sea,
The brown eyes radiant with vivacity—
There shines a brilliant and romantic grace,
A spirit intense and rare, with trace on trace
Of passion, impudence, and energy.
Valiant in velvet, light in ragged luck,
Most vain, most generous, sternly critical,
Buffoon and poet, lover and sensualist:
A deal of Ariel, just a streak of Puck,
Much Antony, of Hamlet most of all,
And something of the Shorter-Catechist.

In the disturbances that are now agitating Samoa, "Vailima," Robert Louis Stevenson's house, has been looted.

THE spectacle of booksellers and librarians exercising the duties of censor of morals has never been an agreeable one to us, but we cannot consider that there is much logic in the proceedings now being taken against Mr. W. F. D. Smith, M.P., in the Strand Division. Apparently for no other reason than that Mr. Smith's firm has boycotted certain novels, an attempt is being made by Mr. Mullett Ellis, who happens to be the author of one of these novels, to unseat him, and represent the constituency in his stead. Were Mr. Ellis a political opponent we could understand the situation better; but he is not. In addition to being the author of the work in question, he is a member of the Primrose League.

MR. CONAN DOYLE and Mr. Kipling were both asked for their support, and both, in their replies, very properly distinguished between Mr. Smith as bookseller and Mr. Smith as legislator. Mr. Kipling wrote: "I cannot see my way to join in the plan you suggest. I do not like the W. H. Smith monopoly, from which I have also suffered; but if the Mr. Smith in Parliament does his duty, and votes straight on the Naval Estimates, I do not think it is fair to worry him on account of the performances of Messrs. Smith." It is fair, perhaps, to worry him; but not in this way. As Mr. Conan Doyle remarks, the worrying should come from the Authors' Society.

ONCE again—this time by the Chronicle—Mr. William Sharp has been taxed with the distinction of being Fiona Macleod. On being requested for an authoritative communication on the subject, Mr. Sharp replied to us:

If I desired to answer the question raised by the Chronicle, I could wish no better or more influential periodical than the ACADEMY wherein either to disclaim or affirm the assertion in question.

But I am in honour bound to respect Miss Macleod's wishes of silence as to her identity: and I may add that I have, therefore, nothing to say on the point at issue, either in the ACADEMY or elsewhere.

WILLIAM SHARP.

So Fiona Macleod remains the lady in the iron mask, and Mr. Sharp the most flattering letter writer of our acquaintance.

WILL the Queen accept the copy of Mr. Walsh's Secret History of the Oxford Movement which was sent to her from the Albert Hall on Tuesday night, with ten thousand requests that she would read it? We do not know. It is interesting to find that this controversial and historical work is in its fifth edition, completing thirty-two thousand copies.

Blackwood's thousandth number, which has already reached its third edition, is a portly handful indeed. It runs to three hundred pages less five, and is a most interesting miscellany of story, criticism, and adventure. Mr. Lang opens the ball with a poem on the great men of Maga's birth—Scott and Wilson and Hogg. Maga reaches four figures auspiciously.

THE new "Nox Ambrosianæ"—the author of which is not stated, but we have a guess—is livelier than some of the old, if not so vigorous. Here is a passage:

SHEPHERD.

O man! It'll no hae far to gang. But I'm weary o' the stage. What think ye o' modern poetry, Mr. De Quinsby?

[ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER finishes his pill-box, but finally replaces it in his pocket.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

A great poet died but lately, Mr. Hogg—

NORTH.

A very great poet. The name of Tennyson will be revered so long as the memory of English literature endures. But what would Alfred have been but for the sage counsel of "crusty Christopher"? The discipline was painful to the young poet at the time, but he was wise enough to profit by it. His note of patriotism, I am glad to think, has been well caught up by Mr. Kipling.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

A wonderfully vigorous and versatile writer, sir; but we still have one great poet of the older generation.

SHEPHERD.

Ye mean Mr. Swinburne? He's a wee thing ower luscious for ma taste.

ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

Mine he pleases to perfection.

NORTH.

A vice of most of the others, as of their brothers the novelists, is introspection and the possession by vague and ill-understood ideas. For example, there's Mr. Davidson—

SHEPHERD

A Scotsman—speak weel o'm—

NORTH.

Mr. Davidson can write pretty songs that might almost have been made by you, James. But he must needs expound theories and philosophies, and so he comes to grief.

AND Mr. Gosse will hardly be expected to like this. The Shepherd has been speaking of Mr. Henderson's volume as Scottish Vernacular Poetry. Christopher North replies:

Such a happy combination of taste and learning is not too common nowadays. There are plenty of pedants on the one hand, like Mr. Furnivall, and plenty of dilettanti on the other, like Mr. Gosse; but not many who possess both learning and discrimination.

SHEPHERD.

Is yon the Maister Gosse or Guse wha ance preshoomed to speak o' "Mary Ferrier"? Haw! haw! haw!

NORTH.

Yes; and he has committed a thousand other gross blunders for which a schoolboy would be scourged.

Before leaving Maga's Number M. we might whisper that the author of the anonymous chapter from the New Gibbon—a nice piece of political satire—is not totally unacquainted with the duties of special correspondent for the Daily Mail.

THE Art Journal having lived fifty years, the proprietors have arranged for a jubilee series of twelve monthly parts which shall illustrate the progress of English Art during that period, and also the progress that has been made in the journalism of Art. The first number contains steel engravings after Turner and Lawrence, and an appreciation of the work of a comparatively young painter in those days, one Thomas Sidney Cooper. The experiment is, we think, very interesting.

WE would crown Mr. Andrew Lang if we wished to reward the critic who can be most genially angry. Just now Mr. Lang is upholding in Longman's Mr. Nutt's complaint in the ACADEMY, that the public and the libraries are indifferent to works of research. Mr. Lang cannot get the recent "proceedings" of a certain learned society at the London Library, or at another large library. Both these institutions began to take them in, and have left off. "Look," says Mr. Lang, "at such a theme as the Gnosticism of Savages. I can imagine none more curious, but who cares? Not the Bishops." Poe said: "As a literary people we are one vast perambulating humbug," and Mr. Lang thanks him for that word. People read novels, although "Mr. Oman's Art of War in the Middle Ages is a thrilling book." Mr. Lang adds: "New novels are literature to the literary world." Meanwhile, Mr. Lang's own novel, Parson Kelly, is appearing in Longman's, and he particularly recommends Mord Em'ly. Mr. Lang is not inconsistent; he wants books of research and he wants good novels, for he reads both, and many papers too. The public has not time to read both, so it takes its choice.

NEXT Wednesday Mr. Ruskin will enter upon his eightieth year. He was born in Brunswick-square, in Bloomsbury, on February 8, 1819, the same year in which the Queen was born. There is talk of a testimonial signed by his admirers. This strikes us as an unnecessary project, and one which is more calculated to disturb the serenity of Mr. Ruskin's retired life than to give him pleasure.

THIS week we give the last of our series of portraits of French authors at home. Ernest Renan, author of the Life of Christ, is the subject. It will soon be eight years since Renan died. His biography, by Madame Darmesteter, which appeared in French and English in 1897, is not likely soon to be excelled as a charming and beautiful record.

ERNEST RENAN.

From a Photograph by Dornach et Cie., Paris.

APROPOS of book distribution in America, concerning which we printed last week a letter from Messrs. Doubleday, McClure & Co., an amusing project is put forward in the Dial. Recalling the successful adventure of Mr. Caleb Atwater, who sold copies of his History of Ohio at the buyers' own doors, a correspondent suggests that in such a practice is "a bonanza for some literary celebrity who is bold enough to embrace it. Imagine Mr. Marion Crawford drawing up to your door in a Roman chariot with a supply of Ave Roma Immortalis, or Mr. Lafcadio Hearn in a jinrikisha with a lapful of his latest Japanese studies, or Colonel Roosevelt dashing up on a mustang with a knapsack full of his forthcoming Rough Riders and a commissary wagon with the rest of the edition following behind! Who could resist the temptation to buy, especially when the distinguished author could without any extra charge put his autograph on the fly-leaf while you were fumbling in your pockets for the money?"

ENGLISH authors might take the hint. Mr. Kipling, in a torpedo catcher, could visit the sea-board towns and send off boatloads of A Fleet in Being; Mr. Crockett might peddle his works from a colporteur's knapsack; Mr. Hewlett, lance in rest, could draw rein before the house, and fling down a copy of his romance wrapped up in a gauntlet; and so forth.

THE above suggestions are, of course, ironical. We do not mean them. Authors seem ready to do and tolerate so much that we hasten to make this statement. In the current Pearson's Magazine is an article entitled "Authors at Play," wherein the side of a literary man's life which ought to be his own property is given to the public with every frankness. Mr. Hall Caine, it seems, "loves the heather" by way of play, and there is the inevitable photograph of him loving the heather in a graceful négligé pose. Mr. Silas K. Hocking "plays tennis," and behold the gifted author of Mr. Silas K. Hocking's books racquet in hand. (It is, of course, not tennis, but lawn tennis.) Mr. Haggard "farms." Hence a portrait of Mr. Haggard carrying a gun and a satchel, as all farmers do. Finally, "Mr. Fred Whishaw bathes." Singular person! Three views of Mr. Fred Whishaw follow. In one, practically naked, he prepares to dive, in another he dives, in the third he stands on the bottom and gazes around. Prodigious!

MR. RUSKIN once said that if an angel visited England her sportsmen would be out at once with their guns to shoot the winged visitant. Mr. Watts, R.A., is of the same opinion. He hates the slaughter of little birds that they may be pillaged of their plumage to make Bond-street gay. So he is painting, for exhibition in London, a picture with a purpose. It will present an altar on which are heaps of feathers, and over which bends an angel of compassion, one of Dante's "birds of God."

MR. PATERSON, one of the winners of last week's Prize Competition, writes: "The competitions, covering so much ground of general interest to the public, seem to me to be not the least successful feature of your entertaining publication. Is there not also room within your scope for lending a hand at times to some much needed reform—e.g., some competition wherein six or eight or ten good reasons, briefly condensed, should be stated in favour of cremation over earth-burial; or points which are most pressing in educational reform? I trust these do not wander too far off ground which is purely literary." We fear that they do.

WITH reference to our Prize Competition of two weeks ago, when we asked our readers to supplement a list of twenty-eight books presented by Mr. Birrell to a public institution, a correspondent sends us particulars of the balance of Mr. Birrell's gift. This is the complete list: Meditations and Reflections: Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, The Imitation of Christ, Bacon's Essays, Sartor Resartus. Politics: Burke's Selected Works, Bright's Speeches, Bagehot's The English Constitution. Biography and History: Plutarch's Lives, Scott's Tales of a Grandfather, Lockhart's Lives of Scott and Burns, Boswell's Johnson, Carlyle's Oliver Cromwell, French Revolution, Past and Present, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, and Macaulay's History. Poetry: Pope's Iliad and Odyssey, Longfellow's Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Burns, Scott, Wordsworth (Mr. Morley's edition), and The Golden Treasury of Song. Fiction: Don Quixote, The Pilgrim's Progress, Robinson Crusoe, Vicar of Wakefield, The Antiquary, Guy Mannering, Heart of Midlothian, Old Mortality, Waverley, Bride of Lammermoor. Miscellaneous: Essays of Elia, Selections from William Hazlitt, Hugh Miller's My Schools and Schoolmasters, Sheridan's Plays, and Macaulay's Essays.

IN making the presentation, the Member for the West Fifehire Parliamentary Division remarked that the best way of showing what could be done was to do it yourself. He had, accordingly, laid out exactly £5 in the purchase of books in which, he had no hesitation in saying, a considerable portion of the wit and wisdom of the world—its accumulated treasures—were embodied. The character of the collection was without fear and without reproach, and each volume might be read over and over again. Some of the books needed to be tackled, but everyone would repay it.

"C. K. S." prints the following letter from Mr. Hall Caine in the Illustrated London News this week:

Greeba Castle, Isle of Man.
27 Jan., '99.

MY DEAR S—,—You ask me can I give you any information about my story, The Drunkard, "who publishes it, and how?" After all that has been said about my story under this title, and about my proposed methods of publishing it, it may be a shock to you to hear that no such story, no such subject, no such title, and no such methods of publishing have ever for one instant had any place in my plans. You will ask me why I have not contradicted a report which has gone so far? For the same reason that I have not contradicted a hundred other reports concerning my doings, or supposed doings—because it is impossible to rectify every error, and if you correct one out of many you seem by implication to authenticate all the rest. Moreover, my experience has been that it is worse than useless to contradict an erroneous statement. If a lie is spicy enough it will go far, and no denial in the world will overtake it. Four or five years ago somebody told the public that I thought "all women inferior to all men." This wise word being nearly the opposite of my belief I contradicted the report, but the contradiction was never heard of by anybody, and the lie went on poisoning for me that part of the public which I desired beyond any other. Two years ago somebody else said that by authorising an "interview" some days before the publication of my last book I was attempting to advertise my own work. This being the exact reverse of what I had really done, I asked the interviewer to explain that I had expressly forbidden the publication of the interview until five days after the publication of the book, but nobody took any heed of the explanation, and the first statement went on and on. A month ago some irreverent humorist announced that I had likened my face to the face of Christ, and though the jest was too foolish and too blasphemous for notice, I was foolish enough to notice it, but no one regards my denial and the lie still lives and flourishes. Unlike these reports the report you refer to is quite harmless, and only silly in the supposition that any man who knows the public as I ought to know it would call his book by a name so stupid and impossible; but though you should publish this contradiction (as you are welcome to do) I know I shall read in the books of reference for the year 1900 that in 1899 I published a story called The Drunkard.

The moral seems to be that it is folly to contradict anything. The more reason there is to contradict an erroneous statement the less wisdom there is in contradicting it.

With thanks and greeting,

My dear S—,

HALL CAINE.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING, who is now in America on a short visit, recently presented a set of his works to a captain in the American Navy, accompanied by these verses:

Zogbaum draws with a pencil,
And I do things with a pen,
But you sit up in a conning tower
Bossing eight hundred men.
Zogbaum takes care of his business,
And I take care of mine;
But you take care of ten thousand tons
Sky-hooting through the brine.
Zogbaum can handle his shadows,
And I can handle my style;
But you can handle a ten-inch gun
To carry seven mile.

A GOOD story of a Marryat novel is told by a writer in the Church Gazette. A philanthropic lady in a fishing village offered to read to a class of young fellows, and hit upon Frank Mildmay as a likely book. As the story progressed, and the Captain's language grew in intensity, she was constrained to substitute such harmless expressions as "dear me" and "bother it" for some of the originals. All, however, was going well until, during the Bible reading, one lad picked up the book and found out how the class had been defrauded. He thereupon told his fellows, and they taxed their benefactor with the bowdlerisation of good literature. She admitted it, and promised to amend her fault, resolving, however, in her own mind to continue to soften Marryat here and there. But her end was defeated, for the boys bought another copy, and one of them checked her off in a loud voice until she could hold out no longer.

THE Chicago Dial, in reviewing a large batch of new books of verse, is severe upon certain names which are usually treated with reverence or respect in this country. Mr. Meredith's Odes in Contribution to the Song of French History, for example, provokes this comment: "These tailings of Mr. Meredith's ore are not rich enough to be worth treatment. What was once merely an affectation with him has become a disease, and we have no wish to inquire too curiously into his understanding of 'incalescent scorpions' and 'hydrocephalic aërolites,' or to ask his interpretation of that Jabberwocky verse,

The friable and the grumous, dizzards both."

And of Songs of Action the same critic writes: "If Dr. Conan Doyle has any regard for what is left of his literary reputation, he will allow his Songs of Action to remain the only volume of verses to which his name is attached." It is piquant to see ourselves as cousins see us.

A FEW weeks ago we reproduced the cover of a new American journal, Public Opinion, which seemed to approximate more nearly to the cover of the ACADEMY than it perhaps ought to have done. The editor now writes to explain that the cover was the result of the imperfectly-understood instructions received by the artist, and a new one has been substituted. Hence we no longer feel as sincerely flattered as we did. Public Opinion, by the way, is a well edited summary of the week's events.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK'S Pleasures of Life, which began its career in 1887, and in 1890 had already reached a twentieth edition, is now re-issued at sixpence, together with its second part. It is in the chapter on the Choice of Books that Sir John Lubbock gives his celebrated list of a hundred best books. The Pleasures of Life has already had a career as a shilling book. One wonders if the sixpenny form will be its last incarnation.

IN publishing some particulars of the libraries in our great public schools a fortnight ago, we regretted that in only a few cases were we able to indicate the favourite reading of the boys. A correspondent now kindly sends us an analysis of books taken from the Tonbridge school library in one year. It is interesting to note that among novelists Ainsworth is the favourite, and Marryat a good second.

MR. J. LOW WARREN has been appointed editor of the New Quarterly, a Church review, which starts in March under the auspices of Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd. The New Quarterly will chiefly deal with the new social, political, and intellectual forces arising in the Church. Among the articles in the first number will be one by Canon Scott-Holland on "Gladstone's Religion." The price of the new review will be sixpence.

WE join in the wide regret which is felt at the death of Mrs. Joseph Parker. Just a month ago we noticed, under the title of "A Gentle Voice," Mrs. Parker's volume of Summer Sonnets—a book which will perpetuate among a large circle of friends the memory of a delicately-cultured mind.

THE death has also occurred, at the age of sixty-one, of Mr. Edward C. Bigmore, who for thirty-three years was assistant to Mr. B. F. Stevens, of the United States Despatch Agency, 4, Trafalgar-square. Mr. Bigmore was an authority on early printed books, and some years ago, with Mr. C. W. H. Wyman, compiled an authoritative work on the Bibliography of Printing, published by Mr. Quaritch. He was a frequent attendant at book auctions, where not a few of the literary treasures that have of late years found their way to America fell to his bid.

IN our article on Recent Verse last week the reviewer, in writing of a very sweet and simple little book called Legends of the Saints, by the Rev. G. N. Woodward, made merry over the fact that in telling the story of St. John and the worm the poet called the worm "she." "We never expected to live to hear a worm called 'she,'" wrote the critic. The author now points out that the worm being a shining glow-worm it could not be anything but she, since it is the female that gives light to attract the male. This is accuracy indeed, and our reviewer can but bow to it. At the same time there is, perhaps, a point where, in ordinary non-scientific references, distinctions of sex may stop and the pronoun "it" be employed. And that the glow-worm is below that point is what our reviewer wished to suggest.

A CORRESPONDENT, "G. C. M.," points out that the writer of "Memoirs of the Moment" last week was in error in stating that Miss Alice Swinburne is no longer living. "Miss Alice Swinburne," he says, "is, I am glad to state, still living. I heard from her this morning, and also from her only sister, Isabel. It was Miss Edith Swinburne who died in 1863."

An epigram, quoted in In Lantern Land:

Don Quixote read romances till his wits,
By nature weak, became extremely hazy;
The modern reader quite collected sits,—
It is the writers only who go crazy.

Bibliographical.

IN the current issue of Macmillan's Magazine, Mr. Arthur F. Davidson, discussing Dumas père, says that "the only professed narrative of the great man's life existent in English—if, indeed, it still exists—must be described either as an egregious parade of unsifted scandal, or at best as a mere compilation of the more or less amusing gossip freely circulating" round the character of Dumas. This is Mr. Davidson's unkind way of describing the Life and Adventures of Alexander Dumas—a work written by Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, and published in two volumes about twenty-five years ago. That this work is out of print may, I think, fairly be assumed, though some copies may be on the shelves of the second-hand booksellers. It is at least certain that Mr. Fitzgerald's volumes would not now be accepted as genuine biography; and a satisfactory English Life of Dumas has yet to be written. Mr. Davidson was himself the translator (eight years ago) of some portions of Dumas' Mémoires, and, to show his impartiality, he now speaks of his version as "rather inadequate"—a phrase which may appease the wrath of Mr. Fitzgerald.

Slowly, but surely, Björnson's dramas (though not at all in the same proportion as his novels) are becoming known to the English public through translations. Ten years ago an American version of his Sigurd Slembe was obtainable in this country. It was not, however, till 1893, when Messrs. Longmans published Mr. William Wilson's rendering of Over Ærne (under the title of Pastor Sang) that a Björnson play was put prominently before the English reader. Then, in 1894, came Mr. Osman Edwards's version of En Hamske, which he called A Gauntlet; this also was issued by Messrs. Longmans. It was a translation of Björnson's revision of En Hamske; some time before, Mr. H. L. Brækstad had turned the original text of En Hamske into English. Now he promises us a rendering of the master's Paul Lange and Tora Parsberg. It will be welcome, but ought not The Editor, or The King, or The New System, or Leonarda, to have had precedence? One would like these to be Englished. A Bankruptcy has been performed in English in America. The only Björnson play that has been performed in England is an adaptation of Mr. Edwards's translation of the revised En Hamske.

In periodical literature how persistently old titles reappear! Next month, it seems, we are to have "a critical review of church work," to be called the New Quarterly. We have already been presented, during the last few days, with a Roman Catholic newspaper entitled the New Era. There is no likelihood of the latter being confused, even for a moment, with the Era, one of the organs of the theatrical profession; and the New Quarterly, we may presume, will have very little in common with the New Quarterly which many of us read with so much interest a few decades ago. Nevertheless, the word "new" as part of the title of a periodical is rather to be deprecated, if only because the course of time necessarily renders it more and more inappropriate and inapplicable.

Great interest, of course, will attach to the new series of literary monographs which Messrs. W. Blackwood announce. Speaking, however, only for myself, I confess to some perturbation about the Matthew Arnold of Mr. Saintsbury and the Robert Browning of Mr. Birrell. Mr. Birrell, you remember, has edited the poetry of Browning—"with notes"; and I recall those notes. Mr. Saintsbury, again, has written about Matthew Arnold in his sketch of the history of English Literature; and I recall the passage. One must not prejudge; and at the same time there is no harm, I hope, in giving expression to a little personal anxiety.

We shall all of us, I think, turn to Mrs. Oliphant's Autobiography and Letters with pleasurable anticipation. I wonder whether the letters will include one which I read within the last twelvemonth, and in which the good lady professed herself quite bewildered by the change brought about in the world of fiction by the abolition of the three-volume novel. She was offering a story for publication, and seemed not to know what, under existing conditions, she ought to ask for it. She was emphatically one of "the old guard," and had not had time in which to adapt herself thoroughly to the circumstances of modern literary labour.

The lady novelists should really be more careful. One of them has been taking up the cudgels in the interests of the rest, and in the course of her protest refers airily to "Susan Centlivre," adding, in parenthesis, and quite unnecessarily, ("the Astraea of Pope"). Now, most of us know that "the Astraea of Pope" was not Mrs. Centlivre at all, but Mrs. Aphra Behn. But how characteristic of the lady novelist that she should not be accurately acquainted even with the literary history of her own sex!

Concerning No. 1 of their "Bibelots" series, Messrs. Gay & Bird advertise that they "will send this volume on approval to any address, if it cannot be seen at your local booksellers." Is this, or is this not, a new departure in the publishing trade in this country? I know, of course, that the plan is being tried in America, and with success. It seems to have its risky side, and it would be interesting to know, by and by, its practical results. Suppose a recipient of the book refused or delayed to pay for it, would it be worth while to put the law in motion to enforce payment?

The old school of punsters, who revelled in the obvious, would probably have called Mr. William Westall "a well-read man." And why? Because he has already published stories called Red Rycington and With the Red Eagle, and now presents us with one entitled A Red Bridal. Mr. Westall seems determined that his titles, at any rate, shall be read.

Magnificent and Multiform Leonardo.

Leonardo da Vinci: Artist, Thinker, and Man of Science.

By Eugene Müntz. (Heinemann. £2 2s.)

WERE atheism true, Michael Angelo could not have been an artist: certainly not the artist whom generations have called, and shall call, "the divino." For Il Divino, more truly than Spinoza, was "drunk with God." But Leonardo da Vinci is the archimage of art; in whom was incarnate, royally and greatly, the pride of the spirit of the natural man superbly lusting after knowledge and lordship over nature, hungry for familiarity with the secrets of her heart: from his youth of strength and beauty, to his old age of majesty and awe, he led the wizard life of a candidate, an aspirant to universal science. Upon the external side of facts he is well described by the now too little studied Fuseli:

LEONARDO DA VINCI.

From the Portrait in the Uffizi, Florence, by an unknown painter.

Such was the dawn of modern art, when Leonardo da Vinci broke forth with a splendour which distanced former excellence: made up of all the elements that constitute the essence of genins, favoured by education and circumstances, all eye, all ear, all grasp; painter, poet, sculptor, anatomist, architect, engineer, chemist, machinist, musician, man of science, and sometimes empiric; he laid hold of every beauty in the enchanted circle, but, without exclusive attachment to one, dismissed in her turn each. Fitter to scatter hints than to teach by example, he wasted life, insatiate in experiment.

Or, as Vasari puts it by a quotation from Petrarch, Leonardo's accomplishment was "hindered by his desire": the ever curious spirit loved more the idea than the realisation of it, the perfect theory than its demonstration, the conscious possession of power than its outward use. To this princely painter the dream of the picture, vivid and immortal before the mind's eye, was dearer than the making it visible to the eyes of men; to execute was less noble than to conceive. And all this, painfully frequent as the attitude of incapable small men, was in his instance the attitude of a golden performer, an imperial executant, whose hands were as masterly as his brain was masterful. Imagine Coleridge, full of magic music and vision, but able to finish Christabel, if he would, yet not finishing it; imagine him, full of metaphysical and theological theories, but, while able to cast them into permanent and complete form, refraining from the light task; imagine him, opulent, at ease, caressed and courted, able to do in his own way all that he was able to do at all, yet almost disdaining or disliking action. We know that this is an imagining, that Coleridge lost his power of initiative, his self-will: but that imagined Coleridge has much in common with the real Leonardo: Leonardo, to quote the old jest, had an impassioned interest in "everything knowable and certain other things," yet the tale of his achievement, as tested or reckoned by great accomplished work, is as poor in quantity as it is rich, splendidly rich, in quality.

To a Baconian zeal for experiment and practical power over nature Leonardo added a spirit of mystical phantasy; the man of science was also the mage, the pursuer of mysteries, the lover of Eleusinian darkness and light. Mr. Swinburne speaks of "that indefinable grace and grave mystery which belong to his slightest and wildest work." An elusive strangeness almost daunting and fascinating together is his note; he gave something of it to his master Verrocchio, much of it to his pupil Luini; he broods, he dreams, his patience surprises hidden things; he moves in "worlds not realised" by the common livor.

Raphaël est baisé par la Grâce à genoux;

Léonard la contemple et pensif, la devine.

That is Sully-Prudhomme. This is Baudelaire:

Léonard de Vinci, miroir profond et sombre,

Où des anges charmants, avec un doux souris

Tout chargé de mystère, apparaissent à l'ombre

Des glaciers et des pins, qui ferment leur pays.

Gautier, describing Baudelaire, says that his lips had the "sinuosités mobiles, voluptueuses et ironiques" of the haunting faces that Leonardo loved to paint. M. Huysmans speaks of "de Vinci dont les troublantes princesses passent dans de mystérieux paysages noirs et bleus." Lamb, the enthusiast for Hogarth, was enamoured of Leonardo, as appears in his prose and verse. He writes to Hazlitt:

O la! your Leonardos of Oxford made my mouth water. I was hurried through the gallery, and they escaped me. What do I say? I was a Goth then, and should not have noticed them. I had not settled my notions of beauty: I have now for ever: the small head, the long eye—that sort of peering curve—the wicked Italian mischief; the stick-at-nothing Herodias' daughter kind of grace. You understand me?

Assuredly Hazlitt understood; and Lamb's informal, dashing phrases express a certain truth about Leonardo not less truly than the elaborate locutions of Mr. Pater, with whom is the last word of æsthetic, as distinct from historical, criticism. A complexity, a secrecy, invests this artist and his art: he is occult, and it is not easy to feel at home with him, to feel sure of his thoughts and tendencies, to realise the manner of the man. We can follow, with fair certainty, the external splendours of his proud progress through a long life to his death in the embrace, as some assert, of King Francis; among the pomps of the Sforza Court at Milan, or in the service of Cæsar Borgia, or in rivalry with Michael Angelo at Florence; but the internal history of the man is dim and veiled. Even the outer history has its conjectured strangenesses: one erudite writer would have us believe that Leonardo visited the East, served the Soldan, and embraced the creed of Islam. We disbelieve it; but how "clouded with a doubt" must be the character of the man about whom it may be plausibly maintained! A votarist of the distinguished and the princely in life, a lover of the choice and rich and rare, a contemner of "the crowd incapable of perfectness," an enthusiast for wisdom and understanding, a man of regal mind and bearing, he has, despite of and because of all that, a very lonely look, as of one "voyaging through strange seas of Thought, alone": a man, as a strange poet has said of him, with eager eyes, that ever restless gleamed

Further to find, yet ever further sought.

Taking the famous symbolism of Goethe, we can say of Leonardo that he sought die Mutter, and was haughtily disposed toward the shallows of thought and faith. Paganism and Christianity were deeply mingled in the man, whose John Baptist points us to the wilderness with the subtle smile of Dionysus alluring to the revel. He would have said with Augustine: "Res ipsa, quæ nunc religio Christiana nuncupatur, erat apud antiquos, nec defuit ab initio generis humani." His imagined epitaph by Platino Piatto makes him say: "Mirator veterum discipulus que memor, Defuit una mihi symmetria prisca." In a profounder sense than the obvious, it is true: he longed for the "symmetria prisca" of the eternal design, for the harmony of the spheres, for the rhythm to which, in light, and speed, and beauty, sprang forth the morning of the world; "symmetria prisca" meant more to him than to Mantegna and Signorelli. There is something in him of Goethe; a like aristocracy of mind and person, a like universality of outlook, a like aloofness amid the mass of men, a like insatiable curiosity, a like self-centred passion for art and science, a like lack of provincial patriotism, a like longing for more light, a like absorption in things of the intellect. And he has something in common with Blake; the spiritual pride of vision, the flame of the mind, the devoted labour, the vastness of speculation, the mystic sense, the interior loneliness. He seems to have had that exaltation of feeling which has made many a madman: the feeling of identity with the universe, yet of isolation from it, a feeling half divine and half infernal, an intoxication and a torment. It is hard to think of Leonardo as a happy man: a nympholept of knowledge may escape the pettier cares, but his desire is illimitable and so unsatisfied.

M. Müntz writes out of the resources of a great learning, a patient laboriousness, a wise judgment, and the fine volumes before us are enriched with a wealth of illustration. It were impossible, from the point of view of artist, critic, or historian, to demand a more complete and worthy setting forth of the magnificent and multiform Leonardo. The work is German in thoroughness and French in charm. Were it but for the catalogues and reproductions we should be right grateful for the goodly volumes. They set to rest certain points of controversy; but to read them with care is not to receive a new or altered impression of Leonardo; rather to deepen and confirm our traditional view. He abides in his mysterious glory, in the rare royalty of his searching spirit and triumphant hand, the man whose least fragment of work is of incalculable suggestiveness and revelation. "Some men," says the Psalmist, "are so strong that they come to fourscore years"; strong of spirit and mind and will and bodily presence, strong in splendour of personality, in reach and aspiration of genius, Leonardo well-nigh fulfilled that span of life. If, at the Manor House of Cloux beside Amboise, he died indeed in the arms of King Francis, there were two kings in the chamber of death, and "Messire Leonardo da Vinci" knew himself to be the greater, by so much as the imperishable exceeds the perishing. The thoughts and dreams of Leonardo are in eternity.

The Pedigree of Man.

The Last Link: our Present Knowledge of the Descent of Man.
By Ernst Haeckel. With Notes and Biographical Sketches by Hans Gadow, F.R.S. (A. & C. Black.)

THE leading actors in the great war of evolutionism who still remain to us are few. Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Hermann Müller, Asa Gray are gone; Herbert Spencer, Wallace, Haeckel, among the protagonists, alone survive. But they survive as acknowledged victors in a closed struggle. Only in the Caroline Islands, at Inverary Castle, and in parts of the Soudan untouched as yet by the culture of the Gordon College, do people still regard evolution as an open question. Elsewhere all is over except the shouting. At the International Congress of Zoology at Cambridge last August, Dr. Haeckel was, therefore, invited to come over and shout. He showed, as it was easy to show, that subsequent research had confirmed almost all his early guesses. His former pupil, Dr. Gadow, has enlarged his utterance on that occasion into a slender booklet by adding a few biographical notes on the fathers of the development theory, and a few excursions on such cognate subjects as evolution and geological time.

Nevertheless, one is glad to have Haeckel's final pronouncement on the question of man's ancestry and its various levels in a convenient form for library reference. For the Jena professor is one of the few learned biologists who possess the priceless gift of imagination, his original sketch of the pedigree of our race, from the simplest organism up to the present day, was marked by powerful imaginative faculty, working under the control of the widest knowledge of biological probabilities. It was a fanciful pedigree, to be sure—fanciful, that is to say, in the sense that many of the successive stages it postulated were not known by geological evidence to exist, but were inferred from the facts of embryology or from survivals in other groups of animals. Some of the sterner biologists looked askance at it accordingly as “too hypothetical”; but time has justified its audacity on the whole; the progress of knowledge has shown that what were once brilliant guesses of Haeckel’s are now ascertained truths of zoological science.

The title, The Last Link, will make the general reader, if there is such a person, conclude in glib haste that the book deals mainly with some recent discovery connecting man with his too-much discussed monkey-like ancestors. In that the general reader will be wholly mistaken. Indeed, the popular notion of “the missing link,” about which we used once to hear so much inept pleasantry, is one which has never troubled men of science. Long ago biology recognised that the true division of the order Primates is not into men and monkeys, but into the three groups of Lemurs, Platyrrhines, and Catarrhines; that man and the higher apes form, together, one section of the Catarrhines; and that man differs less from the great apes of this section than the great apes differ from the lower members of the Catarrhine group. That is as to bodily structure alone; when we come to mind, it may well be questioned whether the greatest gap does not occur within the human species itself—whether Mr. Herbert Spencer is not raised higher above the naked Fuegian than the Fuegian is raised above the chimpanzee; or whether the average European who is capable of constructing and dwelling in a civilised house, with its furniture, books, pictures, musical instruments, and endless appliances, is not raised higher above the Andaman Islander who snoozes in the bush than the Andaman Islander is raised above the howler monkey. The truth is, we have already in our midst endless surviving links between the chimpanzee-like level and the civilised man; we had long ago traces of yet other links in the Cro-Magnon and Neanderthal skulls; and we have recently obtained, in the Pithecanthropus of Java, the skull and femur of an early form of man which stood more than half-way between the Australian savage and the higher apes.

It is not, therefore, this later and higher part of our pedigree which troubles Haeckel most: it is the far earlier chapters, when the ancestors of man were slowly evolving from the simplest invertebrate condition, through fish-like and amphibian forms, to the semi-reptile and the mammal, in types something like those still preserved for us by the duck-billed ornithorhynchus and the spiny anteater. A single sentence will show how much more Haeckel feels the difficulties of these earlier chapters than the advance from ape to man: “Particularly obscure is that part of our ontology which extends from the Gastrea to Amphioxus”—the Gastrea thus airily alluded to being a hypothetical form (not unlike the water-hydra) whose existence at one time is deduced from embryological evidence, while the Amphioxus is the first rough draught of a vertebrate animal lower than any of the true fishes.

God, who has given many great gifts to the German people, including invincible patience, the German language, and the Kaiser, has withheld from them the art of writing clearly; and I cannot honestly say that the man in the street will derive a very graphic picture of the course of evolution in the main line of man’s ancestry either from Haeckel or his more or less English interpreter. The graphic picture is there, it is true, but you need to know the terminology and the nomenclature before you can unearth it. Our genealogical tree, according to the newest lights, starts with the simplest form of animal, an organism without organs, a structureless mass of protoplasm, such as is still preserved for us in the existing Monera. The probable date of this founder of the family is vaguely set down as “the Laurentian period”—that is to say, the epoch of the earliest sedimentary rocks known to us. In the second stage, the naked protoplasm grew into a cell, sometimes clothed with a cell-wall, and became possessed of that mysterious property a nucleus, which acts to the cell pretty much as brain and nervous system act to the complete animal. This is the stage of the existing Amoeba, and also of the egg-cell of any modern species. Next, the cells divided, but remained in union with one another in a small community—and this monastic level is the type preserved in modern eggs by the state of “cleavage” which follows fertilisation. The group of cells so produced looks like a mulberry, and has therefore been described as the morula. After that, we got a hollow ball filled with fluid, and then again a similar ball with its outer wall turned in upon itself, so as to form a cup or sac, the primitive stomach. Thence we progress through various forms of worms, each of which adds a few internal organs such as kidneys, till we arrive at the first faint beginnings of a spinal cord and vertebral column. The onward stages, through creatures resembling the Amphioxus, the lampreys, the mud-fish, the frogs, the primitive reptiles, and the primitive mammals, are easy to trace: no competent evolutionist feels here any grave difficulty. As to the line of development within the mammalian class itself, it is absolute simplicity, the links are evident. Indeed, on the whole, Haeckel’s review of things proved and vindicated is one continued psalm of victory.

But, admirable as it is in its own way, the ordinary reader will find its interest somewhat diminished by sentences like the following: “The Blastula of most animals assumes a new larval form called Gastrula, in which the essential characteristics are that a portion of the blastoderm by invagination converts the Blastula into a cup with double walls”; or this again: “Stage of Prochoriata or early Placentalia: a further development of the Metatheria by the development of a placenta, loss of the marsupium and the marsupial bones, complete division by the perineum of the anal and uro-genital chambers, stronger development of the corpus callosum, or chief commissure of the two hemispheres of the brain.” This is not easy or pretty reading. I cannot honestly describe it as popular science.

GRANT ALLEN.

The Little Language.

Memoir and Correspondence of Susan Ferrier. Edited by John A. Doyle. (Murray. 18s.)

THIS is a memoir—brief and workmanlike—followed by the letters of a distinguished novelist of the early nineteenth century, whose name is less known now. Recent editions of her novels—Marriage, Inheritance, and Destiny—have called renewed attention to Susan Ferrier, and prepared the way for this volume. A Scot, she followed in the wake of Sir Walter's Scottish studies; a woman, she shared the movement represented by Jane Austen. That was a movement towards developing the interest, the humour, and the character in plain everyday life. Miss Ferrier seized on the humorous side of it with success; her vulgar or eccentric characters—Miss Pratt, or Uncle Adam, or Molly Macauley—are still fresh and taking at the present day. The serious side of her novels is "incredibly faded," and never could have been more than successful convention. The best thing in these letters of hers is her own character, in its fresh and humorous days; not the glimpses of other celebrities, which are not worth speaking of, nor the letters from other celebrities, which are few and unimportant. In her later days her joyous heart forsook her, and her letters flag accordingly. It is the earlier letters, particularly those to Miss Claverling, that are most entertaining. Many of them are concerned with the composition of her first novel, Marriage; and, of course, to the student of her novels, are full of attractive detail. But to the majority, who know Miss Ferrier, the novelist, only by name, the chief charm will certainly be the spontaneity of these letters, their life-like flow of high-spirited nonsense. We seem to be overhearing the gay rattle of one merry schoolgirl folling with another; to hear the flutter of light skirts, to see the shaking of long locks, and arms twined round necks. Then some sentence recalls us to the fact that it is the mature Miss Ferrier sparing time from her duties as her father's housekeeper to write to her younger friend. For a woman no longer in youth the high spirits are remarkable—one only wonders that more did not escape into her novels than is actually the case. The jokes may not be first-rate, but the animal spirit is; and if the jesting were of a higher level, the letters would lose in nature what they gained in wit. Here is a fair specimen of these frank, unconsidered epistles—they are too long to quote entire:

As for what you call your perfect man, I can only say our ideas on that subject differ very widely. I've lately discovered that I had the felicity of dancing with this prodigy about two years ago, and I remember I then thought him a perfect child, and could have patted his head and set him on my knee and fed him with sweetmeats for being a good boy and a pretty dancer. But as to his being a perfect man! Wait till he has attained the ripeness of my currant and had some fifty suns to warm him, and then I'll own it possible for him to be perfect.

She goes on to tell a story about a daughter of Henry Mackenzie, the "Man of Feeling":

You must know his eldest daughter has been begotten, born, and bred in such a delicate, elegant, chaste, modest, refined, sentimental manner as baffles the description of a poor, ignorant, homespun maiden like me. Her father's Man of Feeling is a ruffian compared to her. . . . It so happened that one day lately, as she was teaching her little sister to read, what should present itself in black and white but the word bastard! The lady, as all modest maids would or should do in a similar situation, trembled, turned pale, and would undoubtedly have swooned away but for the importunities of the child to be informed of the meaning of the word. After much hesitation she at length told her in a faltering tone that it signified a child without parents, "just such as little Tommy," naming a poor orphan she takes charge of. The child was satisfied. There was a very large party came to dinner shortly after, and one of the party happened to ask this little innocent girl what she was working. "Oh," quoth she, "I am very busy indeed; I'm making a shirt for my sister's bastard."

"My currant" in this letter is probably a punning reference to the famous Curran, whom she had met shortly before. This is her characteristic account of the matter:

I'm going to tell you that I'm deeply and desperately in love! And what makes my case particularly deplorable is that there's not the least prospect of the dear man lending me so much as a little finger to pull me out of the mire into which he has plunged me! Were I possessed of the same mean spirit of bartering as you, I'd have you to guess his degree; but you'd as soon bethink yourself of the Great Cham of Tartary as the Right Honourable John Philpot Curran, Master of the Rolls, Ireland!!! I wish I could give you any idea of his charms, but, alas! my pen does not, like Rousseau's, brûle sur le papier; and none but a pen of fire could trace his character or record the charms of his conversation. Don't set me down for mad, for I assure you I'm only bewitched, and perhaps time and absence may dissolve the magic spells. He had the cruelty to tell me he liked me, and then he left me. Had my eyes been worth a button they'd soon have settled the matter; but there's the misery of being sent into the world with such mussel-shells!! I (a modest maiden) said nothing, and it seems they were silent; and so we parted, never to meet again!!! But, seriously, I have been very much delighted and gratified by a visit from this most extraordinary being, "whose versatility of genius" (as Sir John Carr justly observes for once) "is the astonishment and admiration of all who come within its range." I'll certainly live seven years longer for having seen him.

In this vein she writes to all her friends of the earlier period, but especially to this one bosom friend. Now she is parodying the insufferable epistolary style of Mrs. Montague, now consoling Miss Claverling because her book has brought her under the lash of certain people.

I am not surprised that B.'s purity should take the alarm at your dear works, since she held me up to the scorn of the virtuous and the detestation of the pure in heart for having written a letter to her poor brother, who is now gone, on the subject of "Corn-cutting." You will allow I must have had some ingenuity if I could extract either immorality or indecency from a corn! But so it was. I was reprobated by all the members of that Holy family as one of the most abandoned of my sex. I dare say B., if she were in your situation, would think it a far more innocent way of passing her time to fall into the vapours, or yield herself up an unresisting victim to sullenness and spleen, than exert her faculties, call up the aid of imagination (a thing, by-the-bye, I suppose she thinks no modest maid should have), support her spirits, and, while amusing herself, at the same time take the chance of amusing others—rather than do all this, I ween, she would sit with her "hands folded, eating her own flesh."

Here is a specimen of her favourite way of beginning or ending a letter by pure nonsense.

Go, go, you bad girl, you deserve to be put in a dark closet; but if you'll promise to be good I'll forgive you, so kiss and be friends, and there's a pocket-handkerchief for you to wipe your eyes with, and hem it neatly, and put a loop to it and wear it by your side, and every time you blow your nose you'll become better, and better; by the time it's dirty you'll be quite perfect. Adieu, my dearest.

On the one side it is the wild-spirited schoolgirl; on the other, in its real tenderness, it is something suggestive of a feminine Swift. For, after all, women are the natural masters of the Little Language.

The letters which deal with the composition of her first novel, Marriage (planned between Miss Claverling and herself, and partly assisted in by Miss Claverling), have an interest apart from that of the literary workshop. They show the reaction from romantic fiction in full sway. Miss Claverling appeals to nature, in criticising her friend, as anxiously as any modern realist. "I don't like those high-life conversations," she says; "they are a sort of thing by consent handed down from generation to generation in novels, but have little or no groundwork in truth." So Miss Ferrier's duchesses have to lower their tone and strip their talk of French, which the sensible critic likewise arraigns as unnatural. She truly says that fashionable talk is the most featureless imaginable in real life. Any one who knows the terrible "high-life" talk in the old-fashioned novel will thank Miss Claverling for banishing it from Marriage. We are reminded, indeed, by more than one allusion, that Miss Ferrier and her confidante lived in a period which throw forward the advance-guard of modern realism. Scott had led the way in his lower-class studies from Scottish life, and across the Border had arisen Jane Austen. Twice Miss Austen's name is mentioned with admiration by Miss Ferrier at the time she herself was working on Marriage, and the English lady cannot have been without influence on her Scottish sister.

But of personal contact with her great contemporaries there is little trace in Miss Ferrier's letters. Her life was too retired, her disposition—with all her early high spirits—too reserved. The letters from Scott included in this book are few and trifling; Miss Ferrier's letters about Scott are featureless and trite. They convey little beyond the fact that she found him a kind and unaffected host. The epistles belonging to the later period of her life become grave, and, to say truth, dull. Miss Ferrier without her spirits is but gray reading. For those early letters—the Claverling correspondence—the book is remarkable; and their transparently natural unfolding of a happy, shrewd, affectionate character, veering between youth and maturity, will attract everyone to whom character is fascinating.

Mohammedans and Christians.

Mogreb-el-Aksha: a Journey in Morocco. By R. B. Cunningham Graham. (Heinemann. 9s.) 1898.

SUPERFICIAL is the term that has to be applied to most books of travel. The traveller must needs judge men and things by first impressions, and cannot, as the artist, reject his experiences at will, but must ever stitch singly away at the strange pattern of foreign life with the threads of his slender journeys. Accordingly we find only the journeys of a temperament survive amid the dark continents of past travellers, for temperament creates fresh values, whereas a traveller's mere experience only shakes the old world's kaleidoscope. But the temperament must match or "go with" the colour of the foreign environment—a reason why most Britons, met abroad, seem admirable speeding home—or glaring discords bring us too painful an amusement. Mr. Cunningham Graham's Mogreb-el-Aksha is a book we place high in the scanty ranks of good travel; to the ordinary travel-book it is as an etching of Paul Hellen is to the fashion-plate of the illustrated papers. In place of the usual traveller's prosaic budget of interesting facts we have in it a delicately handled pastel, a picture that does not misinterpret the atmosphere of the Mohammedan world it brings before us, as do almost all the books of travel of Westerners on the East. Furthermore, Mogreb-el-Aksha is a delicious commentary on our Anglo-Saxon civilisation; a malicious and ironic comparison of British commercialised world with the feudal world of Morocco; a subtle, witty commentary that must rejoice all who are rejoiced by Candide. In England, as Meredith bitingly emphasises in One of our Conquerors (a book itself the most acute of all modern criticisms of the Anglo-Saxon mind), we have no good critics of the national life. The Englishman's uneasy self-consciousness cannot stand or understand criticism, and his formidable will-power holds within it too many contradictory worlds for him to do anything but detest clear revelation of self. Mr. Cunninghame Graham's Mogreb-el Acksa has the very unusual quality of presenting us with a world where the humanity of its many passing figures—emirs, caids, sherifs, sheikhs, learned men, wandering poets, Jews, mountebanks, missionaries, horse dealers, negro slaves, and cut-throat tribesmen—is brought out instantly by means of natural finely adjusted tests and placed in amusing relationship to the world of members of Parliament, clergymen, stockbrokers, barristers, journalists, Socialists, minor poets, factory girls, manufacturers, cab-drivers, and blacklegs who pleasingly constitute London society. What is most diverting to us is that the author uses a very large net with a very fine mesh; every type of man can get in, and there he can sort himself out, or swim about as he pleases, for awhile, but the mesh—the mesh is silken and fine. For example:

I had a friend who, being for a short time governor of a province in a Central American Republic, and, finding things become too hot for him, collected all the public money he could find, and silently one night abdicated in a canoe down to the coast, and taking ship came to Lutetia; and then, his money spent, lectured upon the fauna and flora of the country he had robbed; and, touching on the people, always used to say that it was very sad their moral tone was low (p. 78).

This is a little poem in itself. Observe how the rhythm of the passage flows sympathetically round the knave's doings, till the listener feels how natural, how human, how like himself is the governor of that republic. Again, take this passage, and compare it with Borrow:

. . . a tall, thin, cuckoldy-looking Arab knave, dressed in a suit of slop-made European clothes, his trousers half-a-foot too short, his boots unblackened, and himself closely watched by two Franciscan friars. It appeared he was a convert. Now, in Morocco a convert is a most rare and curious animal, and he is usually not a great credit to his capturers. On this occasion, it appears, the convert had been dallying with the Protestants, had given them hopes, had led them on, and at the last, perhaps because he found the North-British water of their baptism too cold for him, or perchance because the Friars gave a dollar more, had fallen away to Rome. However, there he was, a veritable "braud," a sheep who had come into one of the folds, leaving the other seven million nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand and ninety-nine still straying about Morocco, steeped in the errors of Mohammedanism. His captors were a gentlemanlike, extremely handsome, quiet Castilian, who, to speak silver (hablar en plata), seemed a little diffident about his prize, and went about after the fashion of a boy in Texas who has caught a skunk; the other guardian had no doubt, a sturdy Catalonian lay brother, who pointed to the "braud" with pride, and told us, with a phrase verging upon an oath, that he was glad the Protestants had their noses well put out of joint. The victim was a merry sort of knave, who chewed tobacco, spoke almost every language in the world, had travelled, and informed me, when I asked him where he was going, that the "Frayliehs" (Friars) were taking him to Cadiz "to have the water put upon his head." He seemed an old hand at the business, and recognised my follower Swani as an old friend, and they retired to talk things over, with the result that ere night fell the "convert" was in a most unseemly state, and singing Spanish songs, in which Dolores, Mercedillas, and other "chicas" figured largely, and were addressed in terms sufficient to upset a convent of Franciscan Friars (p. 22).

The ironic, kindly delicate insight of this picture might be matched with quotations as good from nearly every other page; it is the style in which the book is written, the style of a rare temperament. Those who do not like wit should not read the book, for it is a succession of such flashes as:

The Caid was of opinion that polygamy was natural to mankind, and asked me if the English did not really think so in their hearts. It is most difficult, without having been duly elected, to speak for a whole nation, so I replied that many acted as if they thought polygamy was right, but that I ventured to opine that "advanced thinkers" in general inclined to polyandry, and that seemed to be the opinion which in the future would prevail. This he thought clearly wrong (p. 239).

Here lies the author's gift, the art of flashing at antagonistic worlds the kindly smile of double-edged acceptance. Now whosoever reconciles to himself the multifarious vagaries of mankind, while criticising all by his fine standard, must pay the penalty of standing by himself. So we find among the great modern authors the man Whitman, who represents the fineness of democracy, is the most unpopular, and the man Meredith, who represents best the aristocratic tradition (mind, we say tradition), has been the least understood by the aristocracy. And Mr. Cunninghame Graham's scattered writings and his Mogreb-el-Acksa, which show the keenest insight into the values of our commercialised life, will be naturally as Arabic to the commercialised public at large. Safe in the bosom of the British system, the individual does not see that its public values are as the values of Britannia metal. But some eccentric few will smile, and smiling take from the shelf the author's Guide to Menteith, and re-read irrelevantly a favourite chapter—"On the Incontinence of Kings."

The Philosophy and Religion of the Greeks.

The Philosophy of Greece. By Alfred William Benn. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

Religion in Greek Literature. By Lewis Campbell, LL.D. (Longmans. 15s.)

MR. BENN'S charming book was written, he tells us, to show how Greek philosophy was the outcome of certain characteristics peculiar to the Greek people. Foremost among these was the striving after moderation, the appreciation of design, and the sense of the interdependence of things which first, according to him, led the Ionians of Asia Minor to look upon the universe as an ordered whole, and thus to lay the foundations of all future philosophy. Then came the rise of the Persian power, driving the Ionians westward into Greater Greece, and thereby producing the Italian school of thought generally associated with the name of Pythagoras, in which the investigation of Nature was combined with the doctrines of immortality and of the transmigration of souls. To this succeeded the Eleatic school, asserting the identity of thought with being, and suggesting, says Mr. Benn, the two great truths of the indestructibility of matter and the conservation of energy. Then a pause due to the beating back of Persia from the shores of Greece, and we come upon the half charlatan Empedocles and the students of Nature, whom Mr. Benn classes together as the "minute" philosophers, to be followed by Protagoras and the Sophists, who set up the perfecting of man's nature as the end of philosophy. And so the way was left clear for the great Sophist, Socrates, concerning whom Mr. Benn gives forth rather an uncertain sound, alleging that his "great philosophical achievement" was "his creation of logical method." But this is in part due to his wholesale rejection of the Platonic dialogues as representing the teaching of Socrates. For Plato himself, "the greatest thinker and writer of all time," Mr. Benn reserves all his enthusiasm. He even lends his idol a personal beauty with which he has not always been credited, and depicts Socrates as tasting "the sweets of a final victory in the ready and rapturous responses of this beautiful youth," and as "catching a reflex of its glory in the light of his half-laughing, half-earnest eyes." His statement of Plato's aims are best given in his own words:

He from whose name the world has coined an adjective to express what is most impracticable and unreal, was through life the most in contact with reality, the most practical of all philosophers, differing from his master in this, as in other respects, only by the greater reach and depth of his views. Purely speculative problems occupy a relatively small part of his writings; and it was perhaps only as a means to the moral reformation of mankind that he ever studied them at all. He might easily have taken refuge from what seemed a hopelessly corrupt world in the contemplation of eternal verities or of eternal mysteries; but this, as he tells us himself, though a good life, was not the best life. The best was to do his part towards the redemption of that world by bringing down the eternal verities and forcing them on its unwilling gaze. His one ambition was to be the happier Aristides the wiser Pericles of an ideal state.

After this it is hardly to be expected that Mr. Benn should be quite fair to Aristotle, whose rejection of paradox does not seem to him a virtue; nor to the Stoics and Epicureans, whom he passes over with rather brief notice. From the study of Neo-Platonism he is debarred by his self-imposed limits, although he speaks in terms of admiration of the "majestic thought" of Plotinos.

In a sketch of such vast extent he would be more than human who entirely avoided error, and it would be easy to point out instances where Mr. Benn has decided disputed points in a way from which many scholars will dissent. Nor are we so sure that he is entirely right in the exclusive and commanding position which he claims for Greek, and specially Ionian, thought. But we are prevented from laying further stress upon this by the admiration that we feel for the masterly manner in which Mr. Benn has accomplished a most difficult task. In a small volume of 300 pages he presents with an entire absence of pedantry the most lucid digest of the earlier Greek philosophy that it has yet been our lot to read, and one from which everyone can derive some benefit. He who knows the Greek philosophers only by hearsay will find here a most attractive introduction to their study; while to the more advanced student the book cannot fail to give much food for reflection.

Turning to Prof. Campbell's book, we had hopes, at the sight of its bulk, that here at last was the classic work on the Greek religion which should be for the English public what Alfred Maury's Religions de la Grèce Antique is for the French. But we were disappointed. The book is founded on the author's Gifford Lectures of 1894-5, and contains hardly a single note or reference to the materials out of which they were constructed. Moreover, though carefully and pleasantly written, it has all the besetting sins of the successful lecturer, such as diffuseness, repetition, and the use of quotation for rhetorical rather than for dialectical purposes. Prof. Campbell expressly disclaims any inquiry into the origins of the religion of the Greeks, but starts in effect with Homer, going on through Hesiod and what he calls "the pantheistic awakening" of the sixth century B.C., to the rise of the Mysteries, and, of course, Socrates and Plato, that which he has to say about post-Platonic writers being so slight that it may safely be neglected. The book is eminently readable, and compiled with care and judgment, but we think the author sometimes takes a too strictly professional view of his subject, particularly when he speaks of "the priestly caste" in Greece—which, as a matter of fact, did not exist—and is apt to confuse religion with ethics. With these exceptions, we have read it with pleasure, and regret that it remains, as Prof. Campbell acknowledges in his title-page, "a sketch in outline." We hope, however, that he will some day follow it up by a more complete work.

Mr. Money-Coutts's Poems.

The Alhambra, and Other Poems. By F. B. Money-Coutts. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

FRANKLY, we must express some disappointment with Mr. Money-Coutts. The bulk of this book has not the quality which his first volume warranted us in hoping. Only in one or two poems do we find the union of fresh thought with closeness of expression, which seems to us his gift at the best. One alone seems to us thoroughly representative, and that is so wholly admirable that, although it has already been quoted in this paper, we make no apology for quoting it again. It is called "The Inquest."

Not labour kills us; no, nor joy:

The incredulity and frown,

The interference and annoy.

The small attritions wear us down.

The little gnat-like buzzings shrill,
 The hurdy-gurdies of the street,
 The common curses of the will—
 These wrap the cerements round our feet.
 And more than all, the look askance
 Of loving souls that cannot gauge
 The numbing touch of circumstance,
 The heavy toll of heritage.
 It is not Death, but Life that slays:
 The night less mountainously lies Upon our lids than foolish day's Infortunate futilities!

The equal match of thought with weight and dignity of utterance in this excellent poem make it difficult to understand how Mr. Money-Coutts could write such a lyric as the following—and there are but too many like it:

GENERAL LIFE.

Here, as if cast by pilfering fays,
 Are scattered Nature's gems:
 Her olivine, her chrysoprase,
 Her crowns and diadems!
 Scarce held the Garden God first made
 And gave the man to till,
 More flowery lawns, more fragrant shade,
 Or birds of sweeter bill!
 Here couches Love 'mid fronded fern;
 Here maidens, venturing in,
 Achieve their liberty to learn
 The sacredness of sin!

The cheap ornament of the first stanza, the undistinguished expression of the second, the general commonplace of the whole are not redeemed by the attempt to administer a shock (and a hackneyed shock) in the last two lines. Though we care for none of the sonnets greatly, it is yet true that meditative compression best suits the poet; when he expatiates in the ampler lyric form, we feel the lack of strong impulse and emotion. Nevertheless, some stanzas of "Mors, Morituri Te Salutamus" rise to Mr. Coutts's worthier level, and deserve to be cited.

Like mariners we sail, of fate unwist,
 With orders sealed and only to be read
 When home has faded in the morning mist,
 And simple faith and innocence are fled!
 Oft we neglect them, being much dismayed
 By phantoms and weird wonders
 That haunt the deep,
 By voices, winds, and thunders,
 Old mariners that cannot pray nor weep,
 And faces of drowned souls that cannot sleep!
 Or else our crew is mutinous, arrayed
 Against us, and the mandate is delayed.

But when the forces that rebelled
 Are satisfied or quelled;
 When sails are trimmed to catch the merry wind,
 And billows dance before and foam behind;
 Free, free at last from tumult and distraction
 Of pleasure beckoned and of pain repelled—
 Free from ourselves and disciplined for action—
 We break the seal of Destiny to find
 The bourne or venture for our cruise designed,
 Then, at that very moment, hark! a cry
 On deck; and then a silence, as of breath
 Held. In the offing, low against the sky,
 Hoves the black flag. . . . Therefore I hate thee, Death!

There is here a thought, delivered through an original image. Nor, elsewhere, are there lacking nature-poems of a certain charm. But, as a whole, Mr. Money-Coutts has done, and will do, better work than this volume.

Tales That Do Not Die.

West Irish Folk-Tales. By W. Larminie. (Elliot Stock. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. LARMINIE is a specialist in folklore, but despite that fact he has produced a book of fascination for the ordinary reader who has imagination enough to accept the improbabilities of the folk-story. He has gathered his tales in Donegal, Achill, and Connemara, sitting by turf-fires in smoky cabins, and winning the reticent Irish peasant to open his heart with the key of sheer sympathy. So far he has something of the magic of that prince of folklorists, Dr. Douglas Hyde. As for poetry, the mere literal rendering of the tales is poetry enough. Nearly all have those strange formulæ common to the folk-story, which, occurring again and again, have the air of chanting; as, for example:

She went then and fitted out a ship, great and gallant, till she raised the great sails, speckled, spotted, as long, as high as the top of the masts; and she left not a rope without tearing, an oar without breaking, with the crawling, creeping creatures, the little beasts, the great beasts of the deep sea coming up on the handle and blade of the oar, till she let two-thirds of the sail go, and one-third held in till the eels were whistling, the froth down and the sand above; till she overtook the red wind of March that was before her, and the red wind of March that was after her did not overtake her; and she was sailing nine months before she came to land.

The present writer well remembers the fascination of these conventions recited in the fire-lit dusk to a circle of wondering children. The stories must be common to all Ireland, for though the tellers were Wicklow peasants, these recitals took place in the county of Dublin. Another feature common to the stories is the curious nonsense endings. The Irish folk-story is made up of heroes and kings, ghosts and graveyards, giants and talking animals. Once in this book it is concerned with Christian beliefs as peasants read them; but "The Woman who Went to Hell" must be an almost unique example. There is no story here possessing the quite perfect horror of Dr. Hyde's "Teig O'Kane and the Corpse," but there are horrors enough, only lightened for the educated mind by odd simplicities and marvels. How old they are, who knows? Mr. Larminie places one no further back than 1870, because the coward in it is the King of Prussia's son, and Prussia was the enemy in that year of calamity to France, Ireland being French to the backbone. But most are old, out of date, and have a common origin with the folk-tales of other people. This, however, is for the specialist. There is no ground so gleaned as not to show corn for the careful gleaner, and Mr. Larminie's volume is a welcome addition to our knowledge of folklore. His labours are worthy to be ranked with those of Kennedy, Curtin, and Dr. Hyde in our own day. For the folk-stories, having been left so long to oral tradition, have at last found a band of energetic, scholarly, and enthusiastic gatherers.

Notes on New Books.

BIOGRAPHY.

IF Mr. Henley's Essay on Burns still rankles, as we believe it does, an antidote or lenitive will be found in The Memory of Burns (Hodge), a collection of addresses on the poet edited by John D. Ross, LL.D. These discourses range in date from 1844 to 1897, and in speakers from Christopher North and Henry Ward Beecher to Mr. Lang and Lord Rosebery. At the close of Christopher North's eulogy are printed a few remarks by Colonel Burns, the poet's son, who confessed modestly that "poetic genius is not hereditary, and in this case the mantle of Elijah has not descended on Elisha." Lord Rosebery's two speeches were made in one day, one at Dumfries and one at Glasgow. Both are warm and eloquent tributes. The latter ended: "How shall we judge anyone? How, at any rate, shall we judge a giant—great in gifts and great in temptation; great in strength and great in weakness? Let us glory in his strength, and be comforted in his weakness."

Two clerical biographies, each concerned with a quiet, uneventful, but distinguished career in the Church, are those of Edward Meyrick Goulburn, Dean of Norwich, by Mr. Berdmore Compton (Murray), and The Rev. W. Sparrow Simpson, D.D., by Mr. W. J. Sparrow Simpson (Longmans). Both volumes have the merit of being short. Goulburn occupied the deanery of Norwich for twenty-three years, and was a liberal as well as an efficient guardian of the Cathedral. The Bishop (the Hon. John Thomas Pelham) and the Dean lived on the north and south sides of the Cathedral during the whole of this period. They never got beyond "My dear Lord" and "My dear Mr. Dean." Goulburn was a warm-hearted, sensitive man, and he would exclaim: "Oh, that want of effusiveness in the good Bishop's character! It is a want, and, however much one may esteem a man, it is impossible to love him without a little gush." The book gives an insight into cathedral-close life, but it is rather tepid reading. Mr. W. Sparrow Simpson was librarian of St. Paul's Cathedral for thirty-five years. He used to say—apropos of interruptions—that "people must really want you if they will come up two hundred steps to speak to you."

We should have liked the Dean of Ely's monograph on Charles Kingsley ("Victorian Era" series, Blackie) better if parts had been less suggestive of a tract for the dissemination of Dr. Stubbs's views on the "Christian Social Movement," the "Great Co-operative Movement," &c. Apart from that, Dr. Stubbs has done his agreeable task well. Those who have not the Letters and Memorials, which must always remain the standard Life, on their bookshelves, will find here a vigorous, sympathetic account of a great personality. The extracts from his books are well chosen. They are tonic. Time cannot dim their virility, their bustle, their glow, and their splendid humanity.

TRAVEL.

Everyone has some glimmering knowledge of the sufferings of the Vaudois in the seventeenth century. Milton burned that story into English memories. It is now revived by Mr. W. Basil Worsfold in The Valley of Light (Macmillan), a book of mingled travel and history written as a series of letters "to Sibyl." This epistolary form is not, we think, well sustained. Sibyl's letters are not given, and Mr. Worsfold resorts to the expedient of quoting to her her own letters. We read: "Really, Sibyl, you are ungrateful. You write——" and then half a page of Sibyl's ungrateful letter is quoted to herself in order that we may understand the reply. This is awkward. However, these matters are not of the essence of the book, which consists of careful, loving notes on the Piedmontese topography and scenery, written in the light of, and with constant reference to, the tragedies and martyrdoms of early times. Here is a typical passage written at Villar:

And now, as I sit here, I hear the voices of the congregation gathering outside. They speak in low tones, and bear themselves in a grave, staid manner, as befits the descendants of the martyrs; so that it is only now and then that I catch a word or hear any stir of movement. There is another sound which never ceases. It is the murmur of the Pellici, as it flings its waters over the rocks or grinds the loose stones along its pebbly bed. A fit counterpart, this never-ceasing murmur in the valley, to the chain of snowy peaks—the wall of rock where (in the beautiful figure of one of the Vandois synodal letters) the poor, persecuted dove, the Church of the Valleys, was driven to make its nest. "We were driven from the Roman Church—they drove us forth, we did not fly—like the dove which makes its nest in the rocks and in the hiding-places of the precipice."

A good point about The Valley of Light is that it is illustrated from the author's own pencil sketches.

In these days of pessimistic warnings about the decline of British trade it is good to learn of new markets that are ripening. In his book, In the Niger Country (Blackwood), Mr. Harold Bindloss emphasises the fact that behind the coast colonies of West Africa, with their thundering beaches and quaking swamps, there is "a dry land of plume-grass, dotted with the small white cattle or checkered by fields of grain. The clusters of rickety hovels give place to strong walled towns with mosques raised high to Allah; and here the camel-trains come in, on the one hand, from Morocco and, on the other, from the Nile." Mr. Bindloss takes us to this region by way of the Gold Coast, the Niger, and New Benin. His conclusions derive special interest from the present negotiations for the taking-over of the Niger Company's territories by the British Government.

All things are double, one against the other, says an old Book, and in literature it is an axiom that when one man is preparing a particular kind of work, another man is also similarly engaged. Mr. Bullen's Cruise of the Cachalot, that curious and informing record of fo'c's'le life, had only just left our hands when there appeared A Shuttle of an Empire's Loom, by Mr. Harry Vandervell (Blackwood), also the narrative of a hand before the mast on a voyage round the world. Mr. Vandervell is, however, more of a traveller and gossip than a writer; his book is yarns and snatches of yarns, fo'c's'le facts and figures, and is not a work of art. Indeed, his main object in writing it seems to be the desire to see the sailor's life ameliorated. With regard to the fo'c's'le's literary tastes, Mr. Vandervell says that among the books brought on board by his companions were Charles Reade, Tennyson, and Carlyle. His own contributions were Weyman, Kipling, Whyte-Melville, and Lytton. Benevolently disposed shipowners and captains might read Mr. Vandervell with profit, and boys suffering from the go-fever might find it tonic.

CRITICISM.

Another of the admirable lectures delivered by Mr. Morris from time to time to craftsmen has just been published in Art and the Beauty of the Earth (Longmans). The discourse in question was addressed chiefly to an audience of potters, in the Burslem Town Hall in 1881, and it is an excellent example of Mr. Morris's clear and clean manner and honest good sense. This is a typical passage:

Again, take another museum that we have still left us, our country churches. Take note of them, I say, to see how art ran through everything; for you must not let the name of "church" mislead you. In times of real art people built their churches in just the same style as their houses; "ecclesiastical art" is an invention of the last thirty years. Well, I myself am just fresh from an out-of-the-way part of the country, near the end of the navigable Thames, where, within a radius of five miles, are some half-dozen tiny village churches, every one of which is a beautiful work of art, with its own individuality. These are the works of the Thames-side country bumpkins, as you would call us, nothing grander than that. If the same sort of people were to design and build them now (since within the last fifty years or so they have lost all the old traditions of building, though they clung to them longer than most people), they could not build anything better than the ordinary little plain Nonconformist chapels that one sees scattered about new neighbourhoods. That is what they correspond with, not an architect-designed new Gothic church. The more you study archaeology the more certain you will become that I am right in this, and that what we have left us of earlier art was made by unhelped people.

It may be doubted, perhaps, whether the phrase "unhelped people" quite expresses the situation: even in those days an architect was necessary, even if he bore another name—but that was one of Mr. Morris's pleasant exaggerations. The book is printed with the author's own golden type.

Certain Americans seem to have taken the shy recluse of Woodbridge under their patronage more completely even than the Omar Khayyam Club; and the Caxton Club of Chicago have been holding an exhibition of first editions of his writings and Fitziana generally. The little pamphlet before us, entitled Edward FitzGerald: Chronological List of His Books, &c. (Chicago: Caxton Club), served as a catalogue of the exhibits, and, for those not yet initiated, as an introduction to the man set apart for honour. It proves at any rate that English collectors of FitzGerald literature have permitted much interesting material to cross the Atlantic.

THEOLOGICAL.

A book that may be expected to appeal to a wide circle of readers is Dr. Fairbairn's Catholicism: Roman and Anglican (Hodder & Stoughton). The distinguished Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, approaches a group of burning questions from the vantage-ground of a privileged outsider; and to students of the Oxford Movement and its sequel these essays, republished from the Contemporary, are of first-rate interest. The interest of the author was roused first by Newman's Apologia; and the part played in the development of the latter by his innate tendency to scepticism is the subject of a group of important papers. Jowett, Hatch, the Cambridge critics, and Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Belief, are among the other subjects treated by Dr. Fairbairn.

An Introduction to the Creeds and to the Te Deum (Methuen) is designed by its author, the Rev. A. E. Burn, for the use of students reading for the Cambridge Theological Tripos. Mr. Burn has advisedly discarded the endeavour to decipher the history of the Christian Symbol backwards, in favour of the straightforward reading of that history in the light of a theory. "I will venture [he writes] to begin from the beginning, passing from the evidence of the New Testament down to the final and polished forms of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, hoping by resolved restraint of language and imagination to commend my theory of their growth."

With Mr. Burn's book is by no means to be confused The Christian Creed: its Origin and Signification, by C. W. Leadbeater (Theosophical Publishing Society). Mr. Leadbeater is not hide-bound by critical traditions. He is in a position to assure us, on clairvoyant authority, that for ΙΗΣΟΥΝΧΡΙΣΤΟΝ (Jesus Christ) we should read ΙΗΤΡΟΝΑΡΙΣΤΟΝ (the chiefest healer); and that Pontius Pilate is a corruption of πόντος πηλῆρος, which "simply means a compressed or densified sea—by no means a bad description of the lower part of the astral plane." These variants (we agree with the author) will receive more serious attention from scholars "when some explorer on the physical plane discovers a manuscript containing them."

VERSE.

To anyone wanting a tremendous revolutionary work we can recommend Umbra Cæli (New Century Press), by Compton Reade. The author, in somewhat lurid verse, unfolds a new system of philosophy. We do not pretend to have read it all. We tried, but were fascinated by this couplet:

Here our ideas diverge. Let me say rather,
I am no separate soul. I am my father.

The italics are Mr. Reade's.

Mr. F. J. Chapman, the author of A Drama of Two Lives (Kegan Paul), is a Canadian, but he has come to the old country for his influences:

Trust it not, the wild, treacherous gladness—
The twin bounds of Passion and Pain
Are swift to arise. In their madness
They rend, and they rest not again!
The day-dream is sweet in the dreaming,
But dreamless the night's dull despair,
When the voice, and the touch, and the gleaming
Have lured thee, and left thee—ah! where?

There is no doubt as to the origin of that strain. Elsewhere Mr. Chapman essays a conclusion to Christabel in the original metre; which proves him to have courage. The most individual thing in the book is a comic biological ballad. Mr. Chapman has fluency and considerable command of rhyme, and his book is quite a pleasant one.

MISCELLANEOUS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The first sentence of The Merry Geo-Gee, by J. G. Lyall (F. V. White & Co.), is sufficiently expressive: "Returning home from Newmarket the other evening after a particularly unsuccessful week, and being in an extra-contemplative mood, the thought recurred to me, as it had so often done before, that I would, by one vehement resolve—a real copper-bottomed, armour-plated, life-and-death resolution—bind myself never to back another horse in a race." This negative resolve was quickly followed by a positive one to write a book on the merry geo-gee, and "how to breed, break, and ride him for'ard away"; also on "the noble art of backing winners on the Turf." These informing and candid pages are the result.

Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen have issued a new edition of William Carleton's romance, The Black Prophet. This, it will be remembered, is a tale of the Irish famine of 1847—"Black '47." Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue contributes an appreciation of Carleton, in which he describes this novel as "a genuine story of 'hard times' in Ireland, by one who is admittedly supreme over all delineators of Irish life and character."

We have also received the third volume of Messrs. Bell's new edition of The Works of George Berkeley, D.D., and the seventh volume of Mr. Ashton Ellis's translation of Richard Wagner's Prose Works.

Fiction.

Ashes of Empire. By R. W. Chambers. (Macmillan. 6s.)

IN The King in Yellow Mr. Chambers showed a remarkable power to depict the terrible and the abnormal. Eccentricity, madness, murder, struggles to the death of individuals and states, the attitude of men and women in times of stir and strife—these are the things that attract him. He brings to their portrayal a gift of narrative, picturesque expression, and a vivid, if somewhat rough, insight into character that removes him from the ranks of those who strive to conceal weakness of characterisation in a plethora of incident.

The story of Ashes of Empire passes mainly in Paris, in the terrible year 1870, and deals with the adventures of two American war correspondents, and their love affairs. History and romance are ingeniously blended; and if we are not always able to agree with Mr. Chambers in his presentment of the men of that period, his staccato pen pictures are, at least, good reading. The reference to Renan in the concluding lines of the paragraph we quote is not only unkind, but also unjust:

The courage and splendid fortitude that brightened the gloom of the year of punishment, the terrible chastisement of a guilty nation, was displayed by the army and the people; the leaders, the politicians, the men in high places, the Government, must look elsewhere for eulogy. Thiers, agitated by senile convulsions; Gambetta, bawling nonsense; Rochefort, brilliant and useless as a will-o'-the-wisp (and as easy to catch); Favre, self-effacing, patriotic, and unequal to his task; Trochu, sombre, fervidly good, living amid hallucinations, a monument of martyred indecision—will some historian, or writer of fiction (whichever you please), be pleased to gild the letters of those great names? And, while the romancer, or historian, is about it, let him regild the name of Renan as he sits feeding himself at Tortoni's in the starving city, splitting platitudes with De Gencourt. He preaches universal brotherhood; he is on good terms with humanity. Incidentally he talks much and familiarly about our Saviour, and eats, eats, always eats.

There are many excellent passages of description scattered through the volume. The story of the ghastly mismanagement of the sortie to Le Bourget is vivid, and carries the reader breathlessly along. The observation, or rather the realisation of things seen with the mind's eye, is often keen and sure. For example:

Off they clattered in the teeth of the storm, the crimson pennon of the orderly's lance cracking like a wet whip-lash in the wind.

Mr. Chambers is not for those who prefer their fiction to amble gently through the gray scenes of everyday life; but if you like a galloping narrative, of war, love, and heroism, deftly touched in upon an historical background, and are willing to let an author have his head in the matter of opinions, read Ashes of Empire.

The Optimist. By Herbert Morrah.
(Pearson. 6s.)

The Faithful City was not a good novel, but it aroused hopes of Mr. Morrah, which are dashed by The Optimist. Here you have neither masterly treatment nor any evidence that the writer has gathered together sufficient material from life to justify him in rushing into print at all. The book displays little observation and little thought. Its psychology is a shallow thing. The plot is full of digressions that merely serve to give a general scrappy and spotty effect. Most of the characters never were on sea or land; also, there are too many of them. And the most nebulous of all is the mild old parson whose temperament gives a title to the book. Mr. Morrah lacks humour. On the other hand, he can write fairly well, in an uneventful, uninspired way.

The Gospel Writ in Steel. By Arthur Paterson.
(Innes. 6s.)

MR. PATERSON, like Mr. Stephen Crane, goes for his local colour to the American War of Secession; but, unlike Mr. Crane, he is less in quest of impressions than of melodrama. Of this he finds plenty. The hero, John Burletson, is a wonderful young man. He stays at home from the war for the sake of his widowed mother. Then, for the sake of the girl he loves, he joins Sherman's army as a courier, in the hope of rescuing his more fortunate rival from a rebel prison. He not only does this, but proves himself a military genius, and wins the personal thanks of Abraham Lincoln for his services; and, in the end, the fortunate rival handsomely gives him up the girl. John Burletson's military adventures seem to us, who know nothing of war, wildly improbable; but they are undeniably exciting reading. The sentimental parts of the book, on the other hand, fail altogether either to convince or interest us.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE GLAMOUR OF THE IMPOSSIBLE. BY COSMO HAMILTON.

The author calls this an "improbability." He also dedicates it to the heroine. The heroine is Mabel Jefferies, who, having lost her own heart to a fashionable artist, captures the affections of the seven pupils of an Army coach, and, unknown to each other, plays with them very cleverly. In the end she turns them all adrift. A flippant, amusing trifle. Mabel's mother was the kind of woman "who spends two hours every morning in the meat department of the Army and Navy Stores." (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)

A BRACE OF YARNS. BY W. BRAUNSTON JONES.

The yarns are: "Jack's Luck," which tells of wrongful imprisonment in San Francisco and a conspiracy of villainy against an honest British tar; and "A Strange Survival," a love story with a happy ending. They are both written with spirit; but persons who dislike the historic present will dislike the latter. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

THE PRIDE OF LIFE. BY SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY, BART.

A rather old-fashioned story of modern life. Says the hero, Mortimer Piers Fitzpiers, eleventh Earl of Arrandale, in the beginning of the book: "I intend to see a little more of the wicked world before I settle down. Cakes and ale, or rather Perrier-Jouet and Bocks, first, and then virtue." He does so before the volume closes, as every practised novel-reader may feel assured. Sir William Magnay is faithful to convention. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

SOME FANTASIES OF FATE. BY M. W. WELBORE.

Mr. Welbore, whose name is fortunately not prophetic, in at least three of his stories sets out to make the flesh creep. One tells of the Boa Cabella, the most terrible of snakes. Another is of a ghost. Another is of a victim of the gods and the sufferings to which they put him. The author has not skill enough to make his tales anything but yarns, yet as yarns they are well told. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

RUPERT ARMSTRONG. BY O. SHAKESPEARE.

This is a history of odd people. The narrator is Agatha Armstrong, Rupert's daughter; and Rupert is an artist who began his career by painting good pictures, and at the time of the story is painting only popular ones. There are many artists like him. The book is a presentation of his character, vaguely but delicately done. (Harpers. 6s.)

PHILIP HELMORE, PRIEST. BY K. A. HOWARTH.

By the rules of modern fiction a man named Philip Helmore must be a priest, and ought by right to have doubts and die a saint. It is so in this book. On the first page Philip Helmore remarks, "It is true. I am seriously determined on taking Holy Orders. Seems damned funny, doesn't it?" He then passes onward to seriousness and unselfish labour, and is killed in a street row in attempting to protect a woman. Another character is named Coryn Tremayne. (Downey. 6s.)

THE COUNTESS TEKLA. BY ROBERT BARR.

A mediæval romance of love and battle, by the author of The Mutable Many, and other novels of modern life and sensation. Mr. Barr's hero is the Emperor Rodolph, who is set down somewhere about the twelfth century; but we are spared archaic talk. The story, which is brisk and exciting, tells how the lovely Countess Tekla became the Empress Tekla. The pages ring with the twang of bow-strings and the blows of axes; and there is enough of treachery and intrigue to satisfy the most exacting reader. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE SOUND OF A VOICE THAT IS STILL. BY A. CAMPBELL.

Another romance of the supernatural. The narrator, after many years in Australia, returns to the family home in Scotland, and straightway acquires the gift of mingling with the dead in their occupation and talk. He then meets his ancestors, and learns from them the rules of life beyond the grave, all of which are explained here at some length. It is a wild, but not uncanny, book; indeed, if Mr. Campbell is to be believed, the spookish existence is a wofully humdrum business. (Redway. 6s.)

THE LOVE STORY OF MARGARET WYNNE. BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

The hero of this novel is named Bayard, and he models his life on Mr. Henley's lines:

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll;
I am the master of my fate;
I am the captain of my soul.

To our mind, however, Jasper cuts rather a poor figure in the early stages of the story; there is too much "repressed suffering" about him; and we are inclined to agree with Sir Jasper Lestrangle, his tyrannical father, that "no man of spirit would put up with what he bears." (F. V. White. 6s.)

THE DAY OF TEMPTATION. BY WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

The frontispiece of this novel gives us a well-arranged struggle in a cosy room. A lady is lying on the carpet, and a butler is seizing a military looking gentleman, with the remark: "I won't see a woman murdered in that cowardly manner, even if you are my master." Mr. Le Queux's chapter headings are, as usual, concentrated drama. We have: "Her Ladyship's Secret," "Silence is Best," "A Secret Despatch," "By Stealth," "I Bear Witness," &c. Ten pages of press notices of Mr. Le Queux's other novels bear witness to his fertility of invention. (F. V. White. 6s.)

HARRY INGLEBY, SURGEON. BY FREDERIC J. WEBB.

This novel is compounded of medical student life, Irish wit and humour, football, and love-making; and it is written in high spirits. We open the book at "The Lay of the Unfortunate Medical Man," and read:

Oh I was a medical student,
And, being uncommonly prudent,
In time became a qualified medical man;
And I got my name emblazoned
On a door and lamp adjacent,
And says I, "I'll help the public all I can."

The ensuing sixteen stanzas are concerned with the comical encounters which the young doctor had with his first patients. A very bright novel. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE SENTIMENTAL MARIA. BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

Eight short stories by the author of Bootle's Baby. (F. V. White. 1s.)

The Ascetic.

THE narrow, thorny path he trod.
"Enter into My joy," said God.
The sad ascetic shook his head;
"I've lost all taste for joy," he said.

The Art of Mark Rutherford.

Why are the novels of Mark Rutherford like none others that we know? Why do we place them on the same shelf as Spinoza's Ethic, and refer to them a good deal oftener? Because they are informed with a wisdom austere and sweet, a magnetic sympathy, an altruism which rejoices in contact with life. Because without them the blacks and duns of life remain for us untranslated, affronting the eye with mere doddiness. In these stories, un moulded by plot and ungilded by epigram, there is yet a fine symmetry and a flashing insight. Every sentence is perfectly clear, and this clarity extends to the exhibition of character and landscape, the working out of the incidents and the effect of the whole. Moreover, the clearness is a natural clearness—it does not mean deprivation of atmosphere, sentiment, eloquence; but it means that there is no “negligible quantity” in the novels, it means that a selective instinct of a high order has assisted at their production. Observers of character know that the cliché of custom lies so strongly on individuals that it is only in one action out of twenty that the average man expresses his own idiosyncrasy in a recognisable form. Mark Rutherford's novels evince the talent that recognises the typical action, and so is able to present the type. When Zachariah, in The Revolution in Tanner's Lane, under stress of emotion informs his guests that unless they believe God's Word they are lost, his wife says: “My dear, will you take any more tea? . . . Major Maitland, may I give you some more tea?” Nothing could repel us more effectually from the chilling nature of this ordinary woman. Mr. Hexton, of whom a similar anecdote is told in The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford, is a being of the same stamp. He did not beat his wife; but he told her to take her books down from the shelf in her sitting-room because they were shabby, and “he wanted a stuffed dog there.” Mrs. Jane Coleman and Mr. Hexton are depreciators, the most formidable of the non-criminal community. It is a class against which Mark Rutherford is specially qualified to direct his deadly camera. Mr.

Furze, the ironmonger, belongs to it. He gets a young man—whose benefactor he regards himself—to write difficult letters with which he is incompetent to deal. “Ten minutes after the letters were posted [he] was perfectly convinced that he had foreseen the necessity of each one—that he had personally and thoroughly controlled the whole day's operations, and that Tom had performed the duties of a merely menial clerk.” As an illustration of the pathos of the depreciator, nothing can be finer than Baruch Cohen's experience when, in a moment of supreme danger, he sees his son Benjamin—once so devoted to him—leave him to his fate in order to rescue his sweetheart. As an illustration of the pathos of the depreciator nothing more beautiful can be found than the story of Miriam, whom the stars and the dawn taught to love her husband.

In the provincial world of shopkeepers, the industrial and “dissenting” world to which Mark Rutherford introduces us, the depreciator is, it must be understood, only one of many subsidiary types, each presented with memorable distinctness, though it be for only a few minutes. Generous and sympathetic people are not rare. Witness Theresa Wollaston (a true comforter), M'Kay (the Drury-lane philanthropist), Mrs. Caffyn (who gave a rector a lesson in charity), and Mrs. Joll, to name no more. Mrs. Joll stands before us in a portrait which no cantor—and which of us has not canted at some time in his life?—can contemplate without wincing. She was a rude, stout, hard person . . . fond of her beer, rather grimy, given to quarrel a little with her husband, could use strong language at times, and was utterly unintelligent so far as book learning went. Nevertheless . . . in her there was the one thing needful—the one thing which, if ever there is to be a Judgment Day, will put her on the right hand; when all sorts of scientific people, religious people, students of poetry, people with exquisite emotions, will go on the left, and be damned everlastingly.

“MARK RUTHERFORD.”

Although they afford a unique exhibition of the types to be met with in "dissenting circles," and show a reverent regard for, and a deep knowledge of, the Scriptures, it were vain to seek in the novels a specific announcement of religious faith. It is not for Mark Rutherford to depreciate the value of pure living and the pursuit of noble purposes by giving them letters of credit on a divine exchequer. "Virtue," says Spinoza, "is to be desired for its own sake; nor is there anything more excellent or more useful to us than virtue, for the sake of which virtue ought to be desired." Integrity of the loftiest kind is the ruling passion of Mark Rutherford's eponymous heroines, of the before-mentioned Zachariah and of himself. Note his career: he breaks his engagement with Ellen because he doubts his own love; he relinquishes his Independent pastorate because his heterodoxy brings him into conflict with his flock; he resigns his appointment as preacher to a Unitarian chapel because "the desire for something like sympathy and love absolutely devoured" him; he tasted the bitterness of poverty and semi-serfdom, but he saw "the Kingdom of God through a little child"; and not too late in his gray and weary life recognised the authentic voice of love in his own heart, and found it Ellen's voice after all.

Mark Rutherford was "delivered"; but Death was not the deliverer, though Death came while his tyrant was apparently dominant. He had learned to command the depths of himself, to pay, not with blood, but the Gethsemane sweat exacted of him who would save even himself, for the truth that was wider than creeds, richer than explanations, being, as it were, both light and ultimate peace. Zachariah, the Calvinist, a "friend of the people," sentenced to imprisonment for complicity in that most sadly comic of failures the march of the Blanketeers in 1817, is led straight by loyalty to an indefinite future in America. "It is not known"—wrote the only authority on that subject to the writer of this article—"and most probably never will be known, what became of Zachariah and Pauline." This we know: they were arrows—bound to go straight. Zachariah's first wife was an incidental victim to the imperious command of his loyalty. We feel him so dutiful that it is natural not to be detained either in his Cimmerian dark of captivity or in his Elysian field of second marriage. We enter and are dismissed from both in half a page. As with the heroes, so with the heroines. In Catharine Furze and Clara Hopgood, a fixity of intention towards a free and pure spiritual life is as evident as in Mark Rutherford. To my mind nothing in literature is more touching than the relations between Catharine and the Rev. Theophilus Cardew and his wife. Here we have passion awakening in a girl of heroic honesty for a man of less indelible nobleness. We see a divine interposition in the girl's favour, one of those accidents more subtle than miracles, and the man is withdrawn from her ere he has wronged by some perfidy of anarchic love the warm-hearted woman wedded to him, whose commonplace echo of himself he disdains. It is not more strange than credible—such is the novelist's persuasiveness—that, in their love for each other, Catharine and the clergyman were both saved: she taught him, by one of those revelations that come to us when the great gray cliff holds us up above and against the surging sea of our desires, to love his wife and to bear with her, and to be simple in his teaching. Over Clara Hopgood the public that speaks of books as "edifying" or "unedifying" has loudly mourned. What a departure! What dangerous, if not wicked counsel! Why? Because Madge Hopgood is a seduced girl who refuses to marry the father of her child on the ground that she no longer loves him. Madge's sensual error is presented with an economy of circumstantial evidence which should satisfy the sensitiveness of all ordinary people. Surprise at the view of marriage put forward is unintelligent. It embodies Miss Arbour's energetic advice to Mark Rutherford, and that principle of sincerity to oneself and others which influenced his own conduct. It is noteworthy that the book is called after the elder sister, "Clara Hopgood." Clara deliberately stood aside at the crucial moment, that the man whom she loved and who loved her might transfer his love to her embarrassed sister. He did so, knowing her history, and his name was Baruch, Spinoza's Jewish name. Clara we leave in Italy, dead in Mazzini's cause, her name living on her niece's lips. With such fine delicacy does Mark Rutherford subordinate the iconoclastic to the heroic. While a scandalised section of his readers are wrangling over Madge with enthusiastic "Individualists" the novelist is thinking all the time of Clara.

There are other imaginative writings by Mark Rutherford. An apology for Saul, supposed to emanate from Rizpah, is a wonderful tour de force. "David turned everything into songs"—how powerful is the sneer!—"my lord never sang nor danced, nor played; it was as much as he could do if he smiled." In this and other theological writings we perceive the strength of the born novelist as much as in the novels. For, after all, it is the faculty of adoption that separates the man of imagination from the mere parrot-perceiver. Not that the mere parrot-perceiver were not great in comparison with the numbers of cleverish novelists who falsify or neglect real happenings to chime with a gross optimism, for at least he is a reporter of facts. But in Mark Rutherford's novels we have much more, we have the submission of facts to the irresistible movement of souls determined on uprightness and sincere in strife. The trumpet of this world is not needed to confirm the imperfect, but authentic, felicity they ascribe to two or three, and would be an impertinence in that dark labour-world of which the fullest and most documentary of them—their putative author's own narratives—gives us such harrowing glimpses. To accept the light in the novels and reject the shadows, on the ground of progress made since the epoch of which they treat, were vain. The millennium is still Himalayan in its aloofness. The "Thing" is no more; and demonstrators are not fired upon. But, with multitudes of pin-pricks and little agonies long drawn out, the strife between superciliousness and philanthropy, capital and labour, sect and sanctity, still goes on. Some of the blacks are now gray, but till the grays vanish before the theophany of paramount day Mark Rutherford's lantern will be a helpful guide.

Toplady as Literature.

THE most touching moment of the black pageant of Mr. Gladstone's funeral, a moment which still vibrates in the memory of those who were present, was when choir and congregation sang the plaintive "Rock of Ages" in the statesman's own Latin translation — "Jesu, pro me perforatus." In that hour it did not matter that its Latinity had been questioned, or that paraphrase had perhaps been carried to extremes. The unveiling on Friday week in the Devonshire Church of Broad Hembury of a mural memorial to Augustus Toplady, the author of the most famous example of devotional poetry in English, reminds one, indeed, that the constant attitude of most minds towards hymns is that of the congregation at Westminster on that historic day. It is not critical. Many people, indeed, seem quite as ready to accept some dreadful doggerel or some silly jingle with the same favour as the "Adeste fideles" or "For all the Saints." Toplady, happily, is beyond criticism in so far as he is revealed to us in "Rock of Ages." No hymn of English origin has been more widely used by every denomination, outside the Roman Church—which stands alone in rejecting the doctrine of free-trade in hymns, and even discards the "Lead, kindly Light," of its own great son. Toplady wrote at least a score of hymns, to say nothing of those which have been attributed to him with insufficient warrant; but, although there are others still in the books, this one alone has lived. It is not surprising that it should be so, since "Rock of Ages" combines in itself all the essential requisites of devotional poetry. Its very conception is poetical; fervent piety burns in every line; in its utter abandonment of self it is suited to all varieties of Christianity; its exquisite simplicity commends it to the least cultured mind. Its plain unmythical directness has had much to do with its popularity, alike with great minds and with small. We find versions of it in most languages, and there are six or seven in Latin, the most familiar of them being, of course, the "Jesu, pro me perforatus," which Mr. Gladstone wrote when he was no older than Toplady was when he composed it.

The career of the distinguished Vicar of Broad Hembury is a terrible example of the futility of theological controversy. Much of his short life—he died at thirty-eight—was devoted to the intemperate advocacy of militant Calvinism, when he might have been adorning the English hymnary with the literature it still so sorely needs. The days in which he lived—he was born in 1740 and died in 1778—were full of hot disputation upon matters of faith and dogma, and Toplady, who had begun by being an admirer of Wesley, was not long in resenting the vivifying impulses which that great man was giving to practical religion. The founder of Methodism was himself a man of his hands when it came to fighting with the carnal weapons of the pamphleteer, but he was a mild controversialist beside his opponent, and it is difficult, indeed, to recognise the author of "Rock of Ages" in the extraordinary virulence with which he attacked those who were so unlucky as not to agree with him. Estimable as he was in private life, the saving grace of charity did not distinguish his printed utterances. Calvin himself spoke charitably of Luther, even under provocation; but it was reserved to Toplady to say of Wesley that his "satanic guilt" was equalled only by his "satanic shamelessness." Wesley retorted by declining to "fight with chimney-sweepers," and his antagonist took his revenge by calling him "an old fox, tarred and feathered," and by proving him to be a not very reprehensible plagiarist from Dr. Johnson. Such were the "apostolic blows and knocks" of the days when people still discussed election, reprobation, predestination, and the rest, as grimly as though they mattered.

Isa Blagden.

ISA BLAGDEN, who is mentioned in the current Quarterly article on "Some Women Poets," and about whom curiosity has been expressed, is entitled to remembrance. For years she was the centre of English society in Florence. Her cultured tastes and kindly disposition attracted many notable persons to her villa on Bellosguardo. She dabbled both in poetry and fiction; and not long after her death, in 1872, her poems were issued in a modest brown-covered volume, with prefatory memoir by Mr. Alfred Austin. The following sonnet is a favourable example of her muse:

SORROW.

If trampled grass gives perfume; if the bowl
Must be well broken ere the wine can flow;
From the abysses of this storm-tossed soul,
From this my destiny's last mortal blow,
From sobs, and sighs, and agonies of tears,
From tortured life, and happiness forborne,
The utter ruin of my youth's lost years,
And from the bitter present's strife forlorn,
The future's terror and the past's despair;
And from this crushed and grief-wrung heart I dare
To call on Thee, O God! Let others bring Their love, obedience, faith, as offering:
I lay my sorrows prostrate at Thy feet,
Avenging God! to Thee bruised flowers are sweet.

But it is Miss Blagden's intimate connexion with the Brownings that will keep her name fresh for many years. It was at her house in Lucca that the late Lord Lytton fell ill in 1857, and Robert Browning shared in the nursing to such an extent that Mrs. Browning protested against her husband thus trifling with his health. Miss Blagden's association with Mrs. Browning was close and long, and when the crushing sorrow of his wife's death fell on Robert Browning she it was who rendered him the greatest help. She took immediate charge of his boy; under her roof the poet lived while the sad duties connected with his wife's burial still kept him in Florence; and she accompanied him and his motherless child to Paris on their departure from the scene of mourning. Mrs. Orr thus writes of Robert Browning when at Miss Blagden's house for the few weeks after Mrs. Browning's death: "He at least gave her [Miss Blagden] cause to deny what has been so often affirmed, that great griefs are necessarily silent. She always spoke of this period as her 'apocalyptic month,' so deeply poetic were the ravings which alternated with the simple human cry of the desolate heart, 'I want her, I want her!'"

To Miss Blagden, "perfect in all kindness to me," Browning wrote the affecting letter concerning his wife's provisional disinterment at Florence, consequent on the placing of the monument designed by Leighton, and, to her death, a delightful and affectionate correspondence was maintained between them. One extract—a tribute to his wife—from Browning's letters to Miss Blagden ought not surely to be forgotten: "But no, dearest Isa. The simple truth is that she was the poet and I the clever person by comparison—remember her limited experience of all kinds, and what she made of it. Remember, on the other hand, how my uninterrupted health and strength and practice with the world have helped me. . . ."

Things Seen.

A Lesson.

I HAD been where bitter things had been spoken of the Church of England; where passion had run riot, and the hissed words "treacheries" and "traitors" had been frequent as "love" and "forgiveness" in a sermon. When I reached home I picked up the thousandth number of Blackwood's Magazine, and I said: "Good! here is something that will distract my mind from the bickerings of this flock, who cannot hear their Shepherd's voice for their own shrieking." But the magazine opened on p. 437, and there I read that one bishop had remarked that the difficulty was caused by ecclesiastical marauders; another, that they had to contend with secret societies; a third (an archbishop, this), that there were men in the Church of England false to their engagements. Then I flung the magazine aside, and went out into the streets, for it was a fine night of stars, and up there was law and harmony, and love too, perhaps. And I walked past the Abbey, till I came to a great open place, and in the midst of this place was the shell of an enormous building that dwarfed the neighbourhood. Then I stopped a wayfarer, and said to him: "What is that black thing that looms so bravely skyward?" He gazed up at the towering walls—so quiet—that seemed to challenge the strength of the still night sky that arched London, and answered: "It's the new Roman Catholic Cathedral."

Glamour.

It was the midday luncheon hour, and one of the many refreshment rooms in the Strand was filling rapidly. The oblong marble-topped tables became more and more congested. Each takes four comfortably, and at mine there was still a vacancy. An oldish man sat facing me poring over a book as he ate. Next him was the empty chair. It was taken by a youth who ordered a pork pie and a glass of lemonade. My opposite neighbour was by now well through his repast, but remained dallying with the printed pages. He was entirely unmoved by the rattling of plates and the strident commands passing between customers and waitress.

The advent of the pork pie roused him momentarily, but he returned to his reading, presumably to finish the chapter. By that time the youth had forgotten all but the sullen delicacy before him.

The stranger rose, and for a brief space hesitated, waiting for some action on the part of the lad. It did not come. Then, in a perfectly grave and composed manner, he said: "I am sorry that I must disturb the symmetry of your meal." The youth moved aside to enable him to slip past. I managed to catch the title of the volume responsible for the older man's absorption. It was Euphues, by John Lyly.

The Grief of Parting.

THE man leaned right into the railway carriage. There was positive anguish in his drawn face. The lady inside was very pretty and beautifully dressed; her softnesses of complexion and hair, of lace and filmy material, triumphed in the searching glare of the electric-light, which showed the rich luxury of every detail of her costume. She smiled with a pretty, regretful tenderness as she replied lightly to his earnest words. He looked at her as if he could never look long enough, as if her face held for him the whole meaning of life. As the train began to move, his fingers fell passionately on the ungloved hand resting on the window ledge, then instinctively he sprang back, raised his hat, and I caught in full light a glimpse of his white face.

Directly the train steamed out of the station the lady rose, carefully rolled up her veil, and, quite indifferent to my presence, proceeded before the mirror in the carriage to dust her face with a dainty pocket handkerchief, and to apply to forehead and nose the minutest layer of powder with a tiny puff. She patted and arranged her curls, drawing them with a hairpin into coquettish position and curve, and then, lowering her veil, she sank into the seat with a sigh of satisfaction.

Memoirs of the Moment.

THE fact that a sculptor's life is nearly always a tragedy does not prevent his death from being something of a tragedy too. Mr. Harry Bates has died before he had time to pause on his upward path to fame. He fought like a tiger against the difficulties that beset the career in England, and beset, too, the execution of nearly every separate commission—stupenduous difficulties they often seem. One speaks, of course, of those sculptors only who are artists first and everything else afterwards—men like Bates and Gilbert and Onslow Ford. Despite his triumphs Bates died still a struggler. His great equestrian statue of Lord Roberts, with its elaborate base, will be his own best monument. The thing had but to be seen to make its own conquests; but at the end of that Herculean labour of production—sufficient in itself, one thinks, to tax the strength of a man and to free him from fresh toils for the rest of his life—there still remained one last incidental despair: where was it to be seen? Its size was such that it could not be got inside even the Academy's hospitable halls: hospitable enough to Bates anyway, though he was not as yet numbered among its Associates. It happened to be the present writer's lot to be at hand when Bates made his plea to Lord Leighton to be allowed to put up the great image of Bobs and his charger in the courtyard of Burlington House. The President was paralysed for the moment by the memory of past refusals to others. He began with the formula he had often used: "But the courtyard does not belong to the Academy, and the Council has no control over it." The eye of Bates was fixed upon him. "Anyhow, my dear Bates," said the President, softening, "we have said that year after year to bores, and only last year said 'no' to a man with a monster fountain (a very fine fountain it was too); so you see the difficulty." Bates made no such weak admission; and before he left he knew he could depend on Lord Leighton's sense of art-comradeship to defy the laws of that dearest of all things to the official mind—precedent. The Leighton he left was not the President of the Council; he was the brother artist and the brother sculptor too. What passed at the Council meeting I do not know; but the statue of Lord Roberts was there to break the sacred and immemorial line of attending carriages at the private view day at Burlington House before it went to its own predestined position in Calcutta.

PASSING along High-street, Kensington, nearly opposite to St. Mary Abbott's, you may see two large bronze bas-reliefs in the doorway of a baker's shop. An idyllic beauty, undoubtedly theirs, causes many a pedestrian to pause before them. But not all their admirers are aware that they are the early work of Harry Bates.

AMONG the seventy men called to the Bar the other day, a certain proportion probably have no expectation of practice. One of them, for instance, is already an officer in the army, and two others are doctors. Sharing the opinion of a popular general, who is a barrister and a doctor as well as a soldier, these new men of law evidently think it does a man no harm as a practitioner in his own profession to be admitted a member of others as well. Approved wearers of wig and gown, they have no more intention, probably, of putting higher pressure than ever on the practising barrister's life by a capture of briefs than the Prince of Wales has of becoming a competitor among surgeons when he is made a Fellow of their Royal College. Of the seventy "called," however, some, no doubt, will rank among "chosen" ones in a career in which there are great prizes. These loom large, no doubt, to the eyes of some among the newly called. "Gentlemen," said a bencher once to the young men he was admitting, "the Woolsack is probably nearer to you to-day in your own vision than it ever will be again." Which dark saying he enlightened by the parable of a man who, walking in hilly country, sees a spire that looks near at the first bird's-eye view, but becomes further and further removed as you approach it by devious tracks. Still, there are men who do "arrive": some to the Woolsack—though the windings of the road may be beginning to look more and more interminable to Sir Richard Webster—and others to only lesser goals; for the bencher who made the remark just quoted, and, no doubt, made it feelingly at the moment, is now the Lord Chief Justice of England.

A LITTLE estate in Warwickshire, not far from Knowle, which was once the property of Lord Byron, has just been sold by his grandson, the present Earl of Lovelace. The Earl is also Baron Wentworth, but it is a little odd and confusing to see the minor title used in the papers this week, in an announcement that "Lord Wentworth is in town, and not, as stated, in Mento Carlo."

THE Rembrandt exhibition at Burlington House has beaten the record of attendances at its winter shows. This is exactly what ought to be, but it is rather better than what many pessimists supposed would be, and the people who are perpetually wretched about the decline of public taste may really take heart. It is a fine thought, too, that England itself is the possessor of nearly all the Rembrandts that are now on exhibition. And England, owning such treasure, should know how best to preserve it. A great difference may be observed in the degrees of care given to the preservation of the pictures, the Duke of Westminster, with his glass covers and the evident silk-handkerchief dustings periodically given to the surface of the canvas, setting an example of care which Lord Spencer and some other owners would do well to take to heart.

LADY BUTLER, before she sails for the Cape in a fortnight, hopes to finish a picture she is painting of a charge at the Alma. In that charge Lord Wantage, then a young lieutenant, carried the English colours with a daring that won the Victoria Cross. Those colours have since hung in the Wellington Chapel at the Barracks in St. James's Park. The other day they were taken down and brought to Lady Butler's studio, whither also came Lord Wantage, who waved the flag once more as he had waved it all those years ago: a spectacle by which those who witnessed it—Lady Wantage and the artist—could not but be moved.

THE elections of Associates at the Academy, on Tuesday night, brought up its members from the ends of England. Mr. Napier Hemy came all the way from Falmouth ("it's a fine town") murmuring the name of Tuke. The conventional contingent meant to have a conventional man, and they had their way with Mr. Cope. The election of Mr. Alfred East, who has been an insistent ghost at the door of Burlington House, allowed several members to breathe freely again, they said; but it was carried by only a single vote. One little irony of the evening was that a large number of votes went to Mr. Edward Scott, a fine artist who is not always sure of being accepted by the selecting committee.

MRS. STANHOPE FORBES has written a book and has illustrated it. Legendary stories from the text and the accompanying drawings are in colour and will, in colour, be reproduced. Mr. Stanhope Forbes's "Fire of London," which had its private view in Mr. Alfred East's studio, has already been put in its place at the Royal Exchange, and he and his wife start for St. Jean de Luz next week, returning to London in time for the Spring exhibitions.

LITTLEMORE station, near Oxford, was burnt down on Tuesday. At this same Littlemore was started by Newman the first monastery of modern Anglicanism, and there it was that he was received into the Roman Catholic Church. On Tuesday, the day of the Littlemore fire, the Protestant demonstration was held in the Albert Hall to protest against what is in fact the result of Newman's influence on the Anglican Church. The coincidence among any but stalwart Protestants might easily become tinged with superstition.

THE following story of the Sirdar, which comes to me bearing the authority of a relative of Lord Kitchener, illustrates, more than any, perhaps, his readiness of resource, his determination, and his painstaking, far-seeing preparedness for events. One evening, as our forces neared Khartoum, a Dervish spy was discovered in camp and promptly taken to headquarters for examination. It was a juncture at which information as to the enemy's position and plans was of the highest importance: but neither the richest bribes nor the direst threats could elicit one word from the prisoner; he affected to be both deaf and dumb. Scarcely was his hearing over—if hearing it can be called—when another spy was led in, who proved equally obdurate. It was maddening; and in “the good old times” torture and short shrift would have been the fate of these brave gentlemen. As it was, they were led away bound, and placed for the night in a well-guarded tent. About half an hour later, when all was settling down to rest in camp, there was a fresh stir and hubbub, and a third spy was dragged in, who, also, would reveal nothing, and was finally placed in the tent with his fellows. Soon the guards outside heard a murmur of voices from within; the dumb spies had found their tongues; but it was impossible to overhear their talk distinctly, or to understand it. An hour or more passed. Then the door of the tent was thrown open, and the third spy appeared and asked to be conducted to headquarters. It was the Sirdar, who in disguise had discovered all he needed to know! It seems that Lord Kitchener always takes the greatest pains to make himself master of the vernacular of any country to which he is sent. He seizes every opportunity of talking with the poorer folks, until he literally speaks like a native.

The Book Market.

A Provincial Library.

THE statistics of a good lending library are always interesting and often instructive. Take those which have just been issued by the Librarian of the Bristol Museum Subscription Library. Bristol is a large town, a centre of culture, and populous of readers. Its tastes in reading, when known, have a value for publishers and authors, and they are set forth with some clearness in the annual report which was submitted to the subscribers last week.

The twelve most popular works in general literature in demand during 1898 were as follows:

Landor's In the Forbidden Land.
 Busch's Bismarck.
Memoir of Lord Tennyson.

Pigou's Phases of My Life.
 Steevens's With Kitchener to Khartum.
 Trotter's Life of John Nicholson.
 Roberts's Forty-one Years in India.
 Bishop's Korea and Her Neighbours.
Collections and Recollections
 Birrell's Sir Frank Lockwood.
 Peary's Northward Over the Great Ice.
 Kearton's With Nature and a Camera.

The twelve most popular works of fiction in this Bristol Library in 1898 were:

Ward's Helbeck of Bannisdale.
 Hope's Rupert of Hentzau.
 Merriman's Roden's Corner.
 Merriman's In Kedar's Tents.
 Hope's Simon Dale.
 Montresor's At the Cross Roads.
 Stevenson's St. Ives.
 Twain's More Tramps Abroad.
 Crawford's Corleone.
 Weyman's Shrewsbury.
 Crockett's Lochinvar.
 Kipling's Day's Work.

This Subscription Library was opened in 1894, and it is managed in conjunction with the Public Reference Library, which is of greater antiquity, and contains 50,000 volumes. A century, and less, ago the Reference Library was used by Coleridge, Southey, Landor, and Sir Humphry Davy. To it, we gather volumes are being continually transferred from the Subscription Library, which is kept in a state of flux as new books pour through it. Last year 1,520 new books, or about two-thirds of the total number of volumes now in the Subscription Library, were put on the shelves.

These and other particulars have been furnished to us by the librarian, Mr. L. Acland Taylor.

Correspondence

The Red Book of the Exchequer.

SIR,—As the ACADEMY (October 15, 1898) was alone in calling attention to the gravity of my “most damaging” attack on the official edition of the Red Book of the Exchequer, and as it urged the absolute necessity of “a complete and well-considered defence,” I ask permission to make it known, through your widely read columns, that an unequivocal judgment has just been pronounced upon the matter. The English Historical Review, through the mouth of one of its editors (the Oxford lecturer in Diplomatic), announces that, “after the most careful consideration” of my own treatise and the attempted reply to it, he must withdraw, as unjustified, the favourable judgment which the above work had obtained, and deliberately admit that, though my “charges are very sweeping,” they are, in fact, “made out.” On the gravity of this admission, in the case of an official production, there is no need to comment.

I should, perhaps, add that, having no case, the editor of this unfortunate production has, in accordance with a well-known adage, relied on making personal charges, of which it need only be said that they are worthy of his historical theories. His assertion that I made use of information in his advance sheets for purposes of my own is not only absolutely unfounded, but is demonstrably so. As a matter of fact, I am under no obligations to him in the matter of the Red Book, while his preface admits "many obligations" to myself in the matter.

My treatise is for private circulation only, but I shall be happy to send some spare copies to historical scholars interested in the study of our national records, or to libraries possessing the Rolls series and used by students of history.—I am, &c.,

Light.

SIR,—In your article in the ACADEMY of the 28th inst. you ask for information concerning Isa Blagden and L. M. Little, referred to in the article "Some Women Poets" in the current number of the Quarterly Review. Isa Blagden was a contemporary of the Brownings; was in their set in Florence; and was a friend of the late Lord Lytton, who, you will remember, was also at one time in that set. You are right in thinking that L. M. Little is the author of Persephone, and Other Poems, and of Wild Myrtle. She is Irish, and was classed by Mr. Gladstone among the women poets whom he considered worthy of a place in literature.—I am, &c.,

THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE,

Books That Are Wanted.

SIR,—Competition No. 16, you say, was "for the best suggestion for one or more books which do not exist, but which ought to exist," and you award the prize to the suggestions of "a skeleton History of the World" and "a Contemporaneous History, giving a bird's-eye view of historical events, &c., taking place all over the earth's surface at the same time from earliest days."

May I point out to you that such a book exists, and has existed since 1888, in Tables of European History, Literature, Science and Art from A.D. 200 to 1888, and of American History, Literature, and Art. By John Nichol, M.A. Oxon, LL.D. Fourth edition. Published by J. Maclehose & Sons, Glasgow.

In parallel columns we have contemporaneous events in Foreign History, English and Scottish History, English Literature, Foreign Literature, Science, Inventions, &c., and the Fine Arts.

The work has been of so much assistance in my own case that I trust you will pardon me for introducing it to the notice of your readers.—I am, &c.,

[We note that the work mentioned by our correspondent covers less than half the world's history.—ED. ACADEMY.]

"John Halifax" and E. A. B.

SIR,—The hypercritical remarks upon my introduction to John Halifax, in your issue of January 21, would have remained unnoticed but for the letter from Messrs. Hurst & Blackett in your last issue. May I be allowed, for the edification of "E. A. B.," to add some additional information which has come under my personal observation? As your readers are aware, the copyright of John Halifax expired last year, and nine different publishers have considered it a desirable speculation to issue new editions; in all there have been some nineteen different editions and prices in circulation since the expiration of the copyright, so that of this "dead book whose destiny is limbo" there were certainly one hundred thousand copies sold during the year. Most publishers would, I think, like a book in this decayed condition.

The construction "E. A. B." has placed upon my introduction is, I think, equal to his knowledge of the popularity of this book. I will not, however, attempt to criticise this part of his review, but I should esteem it a favour if he can come down from what he has so ably illustrated "the stilted and involved" and tell us what he means by the statement, that had John Halifax "been warmed at the Divine Fire it might have ranked as one of the books of the century."

In his last attempt to excuse an indiscretion, he says: "I meant merely that it (the book) had ceased to exist as a literary force." No one, as far as I know, now claims for it this distinction; and even, if it ever possessed such a characteristic, it is quite possible for it to have exhausted itself in this respect after a lapse of fifty years.

4, Stationers' Hall-court, E.C. JOSEPH SHAYLOR.

SIR,—There is a mixture of flippancy and bad taste displayed by your contributor "E. A. B.," which I venture to say will be resented by that macabre battalion of 24,190 corpses who bought the book "whose destiny is limbo." Probably fifty years hence we shall have the Superfine Critic of the period describing us as microbes or fossils for preferring Tales of Unrest to the latest Soudanese romance issued from a Khartoum press; but if we number 24,190, "the literary force" will be then, as now, a sufficient reply to the S. C.—I am, &c.,

G. C. CLARK.

[Far be it from me to call Mr. G. C. Clark, or anyone else who buys books, a corpse. All book-buyers have my respect. If Mr. Clark will peruse my flippancy again, he will see that I applied the term which has aroused his annoyance to the volumes themselves, and not to the purchasers thereof. I maintain my right to call a book a corpse, and not 24,190 accusations of bad taste shall induce me to withdraw the phrase.—E. A. B.]

Bed Books.

SIR,—May I add a few words of personal experience to the interesting correspondence on this subject?

I read Guide Books in bed. Murray's delightful series I prefer, especially the volumes on Spain, Italy, and Greece. Occasionally I take up Baedeker's Guides, and lately I have been reading Grant Allen's most interesting Guides. Nothing is so delicious to me in the short time before I sleep or in wakeful times as a foreign Guide Book. The volumes are easy to hold, full of good reading, and very varied in their contents, and the introductory chapters in Murray's volumes, especially those on Spain, entertaining and sound literature.

I fill my mind with pleasing pictures, set imagination to work, awaken pleasant memories, read myself into a sleepy, composed condition, turn down the gas, and fall sound asleep. The experiment, I can assure you, is worth trying.

—I am, &c.,

GEORGE C. WILLIAMSON.

"Hood's Own," not "Pickwick."

SIR,—Your correspondent who reminds you (ACADEMY, January 21) of the quarrel between Miss Deborah Jenkyns and Captain Brown in Cranford says that "Captain Brown was a champion of Boz, Miss Jenkyns of Johnson." You will find the discussion in Household Words, conducted by Charles Dickens, vol. iv., p. 268 (1852). Of course, Dickens could hardly allow a favourable comparison of his own writings with Rasselas in a periodical edited by himself. Consequently, though, as your correspondent says, Miss Jenkyns "read one of the conversations between Rasselas and Imlac in a high-pitched, majestic voice," &c., Captain Brown's reading was not the account of the Bath "swarry" from Pickwick, but was an extract from Hood's Own.—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 17. Dialect Stories.

To our invitation for pithy local anecdotes, somewhat in the manner of the Cornish Diamonds in the Cornish Magazine, there has been an excellent response. A number of the stories sent in are printed below. The best was from Miss L. Allen Harker, 7, Painswick Lawn, Cheltenham, and it runs as follows:

"Shall we have the prayer for rain, Thomas?" asked the vicar of the clerk, during a protracted drought.

"O, sir, you do exactly as you do please."

"But don't you think it would be a good thing? Rain is badly wanted."

"You do as you please, sir; you'd better 'ave it if-so-be as you do want it."

"But, Thomas, you don't seem to realise the necessity for having the prayer?"

"Bless you, sir! You 'ave that ther' prayer if you be so sot on it—but it won't rain till the moon do change."

To Mr. Harker a cheque for a guinea has been posted.

Here are the contributions of certain other competitors:

"You naughty little girl!" exclaimed the exasperated Sunday-school teacher in Shropshire, "don't you know that if you behave like this, you will never go to Heaven?" "Well, miss, I went to Ellesmere fair last week, and one can't go everywhere."

An old Yorkshire farmer died. The funeral being over, the widow decided to have a tombstone that should do credit both to the deceased and herself. To the local stonemason she explained her wishes: "I don't want nothing out of th' way, but handsome and simple. Like this—

WILLIAM WILSON,

Died Oct. 4th, 1896.

Aged 85.

'The good die young.'

Some years ago a new clergyman was taking Sunday duty in a remote hamlet among the Yorkshire Wolds. After morning service the old clerk came up to him, and observed: "So ye calls them Sauums, do ye? Noo, we never knew what to mak' o' that 'ere P. We allus called 'em Spasms,"

[E. T., Malton.]

An old couple lived on the Welsh side of Monmouthshire. The husband was a large, heavy, mild man of eighty; the wife perhaps fifteen years younger, brisk and energetic, with red withered cheeks and brown eyes. A lady came to see them, and asked after the old man's rheumatism. "Ifow—do—you—do?" he answered with solemn deliberation. "My Gaffer," cried the little wife, "is terrible back'ard in his English; but [reflectively] he helps in the garden; and he deos what I tells him."

[G. M., London.]

A woman in Cumberland received a letter from her son, who was on a long voyage and had not been heard of for many months. Being unable to read, she took the letter among her acquaintances and heard it read so often that she remembered it all.

Unwilling to be thought ignorant, she one day took the letter to a friend and held it before her, pretending to read it. The friend noticed the position of the letter, and said: "Dorsy, woman, thou hods t' letter t' wrang side up!"

"Hod ty tongue," was Dorsy's emphatic rejoinder, "thou windy feull [fool]. Duzzent thou know I'se left handit?"

[R. W. R., Cardiff.]

Many years ago, during my first curacy, I lodged in an old-fashioned farmhouse in "Zemczetshire." Mrs. L., the farmer's wife, very hardworking herself, would never allow that any work her dairymaids, &c., had to do was beyond them; all they had to do was to persevere, or—in her dialect—to "volly on" (=follow on). On one occasion we had for dinner a large dish of good substantial apple dumplings, of which, I should say, quite half a dozen went out into the kitchen. The next day Mrs. L. asked Molly, her maid, for the dumplings left over, and, to her astonishment, learnt that Molly had "vinished" them. "Why, Molly, how did you ever manage that?" "Lor, missus, I did as you've always told me to do; I just vollyed on."

[M. T. P., Chester.]

At the gate of the Hampshire farmhouse stood Sam Rogers, holding a pony, while its owner paid her visit within. The monotonous task had lasted two hours ere the visitor came out, and, gathering her reins, drove away, leaving Sam gazing at his open palm. "Well!" he said aloud as he looked after the carriage, "I'd ha' lent ye a ha'p'ny to ha' maade it tuppence!"

[L. E., Budleigh Salterton.]

A woman living at a farmhouse on the moors above Meltham (a manufacturing village) was asked if she did not feel very lonely up there. "Nay," she replied; "I can't abide busy places like Meltham and London."

[C. M. W., Huddersfield.]

A small gardener's boy in a Herefordshire household—greedy—comes into the kitchen, where the rector's wife has just made some cakes, and remarks:

"A should la-ike zum ca-ake." Then, recalling the lesson for the morning, "Blessed are they that expect nothing": "But A doan't eggs-pax A shall gat ut."

[R. E. V., London.]

The still, hot July afternoon was slumbrous, its soporific effect had penetrated the little village church, with its high pews and whitewashed walls. The musicians in the gallery had laid aside their instruments and assumed various attitudes of repose, for the last psalm had been sung, and their duties were over for the day. A faint odour of rosemary and sweet herbs was exhaled by the posies of the village matrons, and mingled with the taint of peppermint and fustian wafted from the little knot of school children.

Heads nodded, struggled to regain their consciousness with jerks, and then succumbed to the inevitable. Presently one alone remained erect, and eyed the grey-haired vicar in the dizzy height of the three-decker pulpit with a mixture of cunning and solemnity that would have done credit to a jackdaw in the church tower. It was the village idiot. The discourse was sound, but the monotonous voice of the preacher seething. He looked up from his manuscript and beheld his slumbering flock, and for the moment entrusted himself to extempore words: "And yet, with all this before your eyes, you permit slumber to overtake you! All sleeping save you poor fool!"

The pause which followed invited a reply. It came in a thin, cracked voice: "Ess, sure! an' if so be I 'adn't bin a fool I'd 'a bin asleep too!"

What could follow but benediction, and the sound of shuffling feet on the red tiles? [E. W. H., Ledbury.]

Kirsty Cruickshank was an inveterate gossip; her bosom friend, Nanny Brewster, admittedly the shrewdest observer of public morality—and immorality—in Aberdeenshire. The cronies were deploring a more than usually harrowing catastrophe, and Kirsty, as was her wont, exaggerated as she went along.

"Weel, A'll tell ye what it is, Kirsty Cruickshank," said Nanny, summing up with all the air of finality, as her patience oozed out at the finger tips, "A w'ndna be God for a' the world. He maun hae a terrible sair conscience whiles." [J. W., Dundee.]

Scene: The shores of Loch Lomond.

Time: New Year's Eve, 1800.

The revelry was at its height; the lairds were waxing merry in their cups.

During a momentary lull:

First Laird (looking askance at a brother reveller further down the table): "Garscadden's looking unco' gash!"

Second Laird: "Gash? He may weel look gash. He's been dried these twa hoors, but I wadna msk' mention o't, for fear o' disturbin the company." [F. M. W., Ilford.]

Some years ago a proposal was made to build a high wall round a Nottingham cemetery. When the matter was brought before the town council, most of the members were in favour of erecting the wall. One, however, objected in the following terms: "Mr. Mayor, though I may stand alone, I strongly object to buid'ing this 'ere wall, and my reasons is that them as is inside the cimitery canna git out, and them as is outside don't want to git in."

Competition No. 18.

In the first chapter of Vanity Fair it is related that in the cover of the Johnson's Dictionary which Miss Pinkerton presented as a leaving-gift to Miss Amelia Sedley was inserted a copy of "Lines addressed to a young lady on quitting Miss Pinkerton's school at the Mall; by the late revered Doctor Samuel Johnson." We ask for this poem. It should not exceed twelve lines, and it must be Johnsonian in diction and sentiment. To the author of the best effort a cheque for one guinea will be sent.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, February 7th. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 172. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The "Academy" Bureau.

Books in Manuscript.

An Offer to Authors.

THE Conductors of the Bureau established in connexion with the ACADEMY invite works in MS. for consideration. They have made arrangements by which a proposal for publication will be made for every MS. which, in their judgment, is sufficiently meritorious. No fee for reading and reporting, or for agency between author and publisher, will be charged unless a contract is arranged. The project was set forth more fully in our issues of October 8 and 15. Each MS. should be accompanied by an assumed name or initials, under which our criticism will be printed. The words "ACADEMY Bureau" must be marked on the wrapper, and the parcel accompanied by postage stamps for return if not accepted. It is to be distinctly understood that each MS. should contain enough to fill a volume, and that the proposal applies only to books that have not been published. The conductors of the Bureau will take every care of MSS. submitted to them, but will not be responsible for accidental loss. They cannot enter into correspondence with authors on the subject of books criticised in the Bureau, or as to completed agreements.

LAYS OF LONDON.

By "SOSTRATUS."

This volume has given us considerable pleasure. Many of the pieces have grace and wit. We hold the MS. over for further consideration.

THE DEATH OF LOYS, AND OTHER POEMS.

By "CAROLUS."

Some of the pieces in this volume we have read two or three times. That was because we could not easily discover what "Carolus" wished to say. At length, we think, we catch his intention. He has had, or affects to have had, unfortunate experience with women, and writes laments full of sorrow and death and the flames of Hell. We cannot say that we have found the dirges either instructive or wholesomely alarming. Besides, "Carolus" is rather wordy. He makes his rhetorical points; but his pages are so much tricked out with decorative stanzas about the flowers, and the rivulets, and the moon, that the points are much obscured. The result is that we seem to be reading an allegory when we are reading nothing so ambitious. This is so in the cases of "The Death of Loys," "The Kiss," and "The Garden of Sin." Further, we are sorry to note, in a scrutiny which the nature of "Carolus's" muse obliged us to make close, that in some of the pieces there is patchwork of an objectionable kind. For example, a young woman strolled out into the garden where the poet was ruminating about noxious weeds.

There, some dull green metallic frowd

She raised and held to her warm lips

A long while—and then moved beyond,

Trailing in leaves her finger-tips.

I feared to pray. Ah! wonder-sweet

Was her young bosom's breathing bend;

The limbs were known, though veiled; the feet

Were bare—and she appeared to wend

With a keen sense of cool delight

Among the embathing herbage.

"I feared to pray." We cannot imagine it possible that amid such circumstances the poet thought of prayer at all. The words are put in, not because they are felt, but merely because four syllables are wanted. The result is that an interesting situation is falsified and disfigured. We have dealt thus carefully with "Carolus" because we feel that he really does have a gift. He must strive to use it more worthily.

POEMS.

BY "SOUTHERN SCOT."

"Southern Scot" is a prolific bard. Here we have verses enough to make a volume which would be much nobler, in bulk, than the collected works of Mr. William Watson. Most of them have merit of a kind. Here is a specimen:

TO SIR FAUDEL PHILLIPS.

Sir Faudel! Ere you quit the Civic Chair,
Which you have graced with masterly address,
We Londoners would fittingly express
The fond appreciation which we bear
For all your virtues. Courteous, debonair,
And unexcelled in princely bounteousness,
Withal most ready to relieve distress,
We can but hail you the ideal Mayor.
The happy chance which gave your services
To London in this year without compare
Has given us the privilege to bless
Your rich beneficence and bright success.
Farewell, Sir Faudel; we'll forget you ne'er,
And Fame shall crown you London's Record Mayor.

In what respect do these lines differ from prose? The only difference that we ourselves can see lies in the fact that, having been put into rhyme and rhythm, the tribute to a worthy man is laughable. A minstrel ought not to render absurd the person whom he wishes to extol. Many of "Southern Scot's" pieces are akin to that which we have quoted. They were written for passing reasons, and have no claim to permanence. We do not wish to discourage our clever correspondent; but he should have had more respect for Poetry, and perhaps for ourselves, than he shows by submitting to us a volume in which the ephemeral pieces are so many.

BEGGARS OF THE SEA.

BY D. R. B.

D. R. B. strikes us as being well-informed about the period of Queen Elizabeth, in which his tale is laid. Of our various impressions of this work, that is the most favourable. The work is not in other respects equal to writings which we understand to have come from the same pen. It lacks lightness and sparkle: we find it rather hard reading. Incidentally let us note that the style is occasionally slack: for example, when D. R. B. says "replaced" when he means supplanted. Such details as that seem small; but we consider them important.

POEMS.

BY "NESTOR."

"Nestor" is in the boyish stage of poesy. He is fluent, and has feeling; but he lacks mastery of his medium. Here is a passage which is typical of many others:

The spirit of Unrest is now abroad;
The winds do moan among the forest trees
In ill-timed unison, as though they sought
To linger yet awhile. The rippling waters
Of the peaceful stream where beasts do quench their thirst
Are fain to quarrel 'mong the pebbly rocks,
Which rise all silent 'mid its winding course.
The lion, too, does fiercely paw the ground,
As though he sought to cast off from his mind
Some fell disquietude. While high above
The moon does mocking play with earthly thoughts,
For hers are hid, so that she may not tell
The secrets that do haunt the midnight air.

Note the words which we have italicised. The clumsy locution of which in each case they are a part is one of the commonest faults in immature verse-writing. The passage has errors of other kinds; indeed, it is almost all error. "Nestor" has not written poems. He has written only notes for poems.

Book Reviews Reviewed.

THE disagreements of critics are not really more remarkable than their agreements. Here are extracts from two reviews of Mr. Norris's latest novel, which in form and matter are singularly alike. In each the same question is asked and answered:

Literature.

Why is it that a novelist who scorns to enliven his pages by "incident," amusing or sensational, who disdains atmosphere, and never stimulates our fancy with the picturesque, whose characters never talk cleverly or reveal any acquaintance with books or with any kind of life but their own, and whose range is absolutely circumscribed within the limits of a society narrow both in numbers and area—why is it that such a novelist should detain the reader so that he "cannot choose but hear," as Mr. Norris unquestionably does?

First, Mr. Norris, as a writer of fiction, has what was so conspicuous in Anthony Trollope—perfect sincerity. He has no notion of intruding himself into his story. His sole object is to endow his puppets with life, and give them perfectly free play without putting his own witticisms in their mouths, or befogging them and the reader with his own reflections on life.

The Daily Telegraph.

Only compare Mr. Norris's work with that of a host of writers whom it would be invidious to particularise, and you see at once the difference between a photographic reproduction of the commonplace and a masterpiece of genre painting. Nothing could be quieter than The Widower; there is scarcely any incident, yet long before the picture is completed we are as well acquainted with James Pennant and his wayward daughter, Cuckoo, with Lady Wardlaw and Harry Carew, as with our own familiar friends.

How is it done? Largely by a complete self-suppression. From the first page to the last the author never obtrudes his own personality. In a word, whilst keeping to the quiet conversational tone of good society, he puts before you certain well-bred men and women with exactly as much detailed description as is required to make the portraits living.

THE LIFE of HENRY DRUMMOND. By George

ADAM SMITH. With Two Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"The eloquent and popular author of 'Natural Law in the Spiritual World' and the 'Ascent of Man,' has been fortunate in his biographer. Dr. George Adam Smith has not only made the life-story of his hero interesting, but he has written a book which will be read with avidity for its own sake."—Daily News.

"A very large audience may safely be predicted for this biography. The work is well done.... A more devout life has rarely been portrayed, a cleaner soul has not often been unveiled."—Spectator.

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

THE LIFE of R. W. DALE, of BIRMINGHAM.

By his Son, A. W. W. DALE, M.A. In one handsome octavo volume, pp. 781. With Portrait. 8vo, cloth, 14s.

"We have nothing but congratulations to offer to Mr. A. W. W. Dale on the manner in which he has accomplished his task.... We hope that our readers will see that this is a book which they ought to read for themselves. It is the record of a singularly noble life, and forms a worthy memorial of a teacher whom Churchmen and Nonconformists alike must ever hold in honour."—Guardian.

BY A NEW WRITER.

BLACK ROCK: a Tale of the Selkirks. By RALPH CONNOR. With Introduction by Professor GEORGE ADAM SMITH, LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"It has rarely been our good fortune to come across a book in which the freshest humour, the truest pathos, and the most exquisite tenderness are so freely displayed. Ralph Connor's story is real, his characters are real men and women, his person is a real hero, and we are the better for making their acquaintance. There is not a lay figure in the book, nor a dull page. It is full of life, and tears, and laughter, and all the essence of good literature, as any novel we have seen this year."—Literature.

ELEVENTH EDITION, COMPLETING 23,000.

CONCERNING ISABEL CARNABY. By Ellen

THORNEYCROFT FOWLER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Miss Fowler has achieved a success as thoroughly gratifying to her readers as it must be to herself. 'The novel of the season' will probably be the popular verdict upon this amazingly witty and brilliant story.... The book positively radiates humour.... Epigram, paradox, anecdote—in short, all the weapons in the born conversationalist's armoury—appear in this entertaining novel in a state of the highest polish, and the dialogues alone would make the fortune of the story."—Speaker.

The Literary Week.

SPEAKING a few weeks ago at Montrose, Mr. Morley assured his constituents that his employment on The Life of Mr. Gladstone would not lessen his attention to their interests in Parliamentary affairs. We note this matter from the fact that Mr. Morley's Chatham, in the "Twelve English Statesmen" series, is still awaited by the reading world; that the work has been "announced" these ten years past; and that the public have been frequently informed that the author's pressing Parliamentary duties have left him little time to devote to the writing of that book. The eleventh volume of the series (Lord Rosebery's Pitt) was published eight years ago, and the lack of Mr. Morley's contribution gives the set of "Twelve English Statesmen" a somewhat ludicrous appearance. The issue of the Chatham must now be a matter of very remote probability. It passes into the category of books that are wanted.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN purpose bringing out in the spring a cheaper edition of the Life of Tennyson. The book will be in one volume, and the price will, probably, be the same as the price of the one-volume edition of Lord Roberts's Forty-one Years in India—viz., ten shillings net.

IN looking through the 1899 issue of Index Librorum Prohibitorum we have been much struck by the omissions. Renan is condemned, and Strauss, and Gibbon, and Lord Acton's contributions to the history of the Vatican Council; but where are the names of Froude, Bright, Robertson, Milman, Stubbs, and Croighton? You must not read Dr. Mivart's articles on "Happiness in Hell," but Mr. Gladstone's Vaticanism is without reproof. Boccaccio is condemned ("until expurgated"), and of M. Zola's output not even Le Rêve escapes damnation; but Maupassant is judged innocuous; so is M. Marcel Prévost; and so is the earlier work of M. Huysmans. Messrs. Smith will hardly believe it, but the name of the author of Evelyn Innes has escaped. After which it need hardly be added that Ibsen and Tolstoy may still be enjoyed by the faithful.

WE have received from Mr. J. MacWhirter, R.A., a cheque for five guineas for the furtherance of Lord Archibald Campbell's project of perpetuating Mr. William Black's memory by placing a lifeboat in a station in the West Highlands. Mr. MacWhirter describes the idea as an excellent one. We have sent his cheque to the editor of the Oban Times.

Who is Fiona Macleod? Mr. William Sharp is met on the literary highway with the alternative "Her name or her life!" If he will not produce the author, whom he has called his friend and his cousin, he is told that himself will be adjudged to be Fiona Macleod and no other. For, says one of the lady's pursuers, though she has written letters, and her photograph has been shown, nobody has ever seen her in the flesh. But on that point a correspondent can speak with authority when he says that the lady referred to by Mr. Sharp has undoubtedly an actual existence of her own. She has been seen repeatedly by her publisher, and she has been a pilgrim to at least one literary Mecca, where an English man of letters discussed with her the Celtic movement in modern literature. About two years ago she was in London on a visit, and one biographical fact at least she let drop—that she was a married woman. Of course this does not prove that she wrote the books attributed to her, either wholly or in part; but that there is a living woman who claims to be the author, and upon whom others have set eyes, is beyond dispute.

THE six books which sold best in America during the past month were:

Rudyard Kipling's Day's Work.
Gilbert Parker's Battle of the Strong.
Weir Mitchell's Adventures of François.
Thomas Nelson Page's Red Rock.
Stanley Weyman's Castle Inn.
Translation of Cyrano de Bergerac.

It is a little odd that The Forest Lovers seems to have met with no popularity across the Atlantic.

MR. "BENJAMIN SWIFT'S" new novel will be called Siren City. It will deal with the continual battle waging between Puritanism and Paganism. As the author writes to a friend: "Puritanism is made, I think, to win the victory without any ambiguity. I have dreamed over this book a long time, but the mere mechanical work of putting it together I do very quickly. Human passion and emotion are rapid, and I think they should be rapidly portrayed. I hate long novels."

Two of our London realists, Mr. Arthur Morrison and Mr. Edwin Pugh, have each finished a new book. Mr. Morrison's is called To London Town, Mr. Pugh's is a companion to his Tony Drum. Meanwhile, we notice that Mr. Clarence Rook is contributing a series of studies of Hooligan character to the Chronicle.

MR. RUSKIN'S eightieth birthday was celebrated on Wednesday, the 8th. It found Mr. Ruskin well and peaceful. The old fires no longer burn; nothing is left

JOHN RUSKIN IN MIDDLE LIFE.

Photograph by W. & D. Downey.

but pure white ash. Although he was strong enough to receive a deputation in person he was unable to reply to their good wishes and ardent sentiments; for in such felicitations, pleasant though it may be to offer them, he can now himself have little pleasure: he is outside it all. The thought that the inspiring friend of so much splendid effort for humanity is passing so quietly and happily should be a very consoling one. That, for his admirers and disciples, must be enough. Mr. Ruskin is wearing his crown of wild olive: "type of grey honour and sweet rest."

WE have so recently printed an article on Mr. Ruskin's work and influence, illustrated by a reproduction of Mr. Hollier's fine portrait of the Master seated in his library at Brantwood, overlooking Coniston Lake, that we say only these few words now. But that portrait is here reproduced in little, together with an old likeness of Mr. Ruskin taken in the sixties, in a characteristic attitude, his walking-stick grasped as though for the castigation of carelessness and fraud.

THE following is a portion of the text of the address presented to Mr. Ruskin by the members of St. George's Guild, various Ruskin Societies, and a number of Royal Academicians, other artists, and literary and scientific men and women:

OUR DEAR MASTER AND FRIEND,

The eightieth anniversary of your birthday gives us the opportunity of offering our united loving greetings and heartiest congratulations.

As the representative members of the St. George's Guild and the Ruskin Societies of the country—owing so much of the good and joy of life to your words and work—we feel that the world is richer and happier for the lasting benefits which you have been able to confer upon all who have come under your influence.

Year by year there is, in ever-widening extent, an increasing trust in your ethical, social, and art teaching, an increasing desire to realise the noble ideals you have set before mankind, in words which we feel have brought nearer to our hearts the kingdom of God upon earth.

It is our fervent hope and prayer that the joy and peace you have beneficently brought to others may return in full measure to your own heart, filling it with the peace which comes from love of God and the knowledge of the love of your fellow-men.

It will be a great happiness to us if you will consent to your portrait being painted by your life-long friend, William Holman Hunt, and accept the same as the national property of the St. George's Guild, in token of our affectionate devotion.

Whether or not Mr. Ruskin's friends will permit Mr. Holman Hunt to paint this portrait remains to be seen.

THE Faculty of Ruskin Hall, which is to be opened at Oxford on the 22nd inst., also presented Mr. Ruskin with a photograph of the building and an address. It ran thus:

We venture to ask your acceptance of the photograph of Ruskin Hall, on this your eightieth birthday, when the English-speaking nations turn to you in grateful admiration for your immortal work in the service of humanity. Not alone to Ruskin, the eloquent art critic, has this college been dedicated, but to Ruskin the Prophet, Ruskin the Road-builder. You found the labourer branded by the literature of the world as a mere commodity, a contemptible mechanism; you lifted him up before all mankind, declaring him to be "the holiest, perfectest, and purest person the earth can at present show." Our highest wish is that those who study at Ruskin Hall may prove by their lives that this statement is not exaggeration.

This, however, was forwarded by post, and not carried to Brantwood by the Faculty in person.

WAS it, we wonder, intentional or by coincidence that Wednesday, the occasion of Mr. Ruskin's birthday, should have been chosen for a meeting to discuss the scheme for a memorial to his old friend, the late Sir John Millais? At this meeting, over which the Prince of Wales presided, it was agreed that, St. Paul's being declared an impracticable site, a statue of the artist be erected in a prominent position in connexion with the National Gallery of British Art at Millbank. The sum of £727 was collected in the room.

JOHN RUSKIN IN OLD AGE.

Photograph by F. Holl, cr.

HITHERTO the Americans have admired rather than liked Mr. Kipling. His letters to the Times were too outspoken, and his verses on the American Spirit did nothing towards a reconciliation. But "The White Man's Burden," which appeared in the February McClure's Magazine and in Literature, &c., and has since been copied into most American papers, seems likely to obliterate rancour. Therein Mr. Kipling calls on the victors of the recent war to realise what their responsibilities as colonists are, and to range themselves with the Mother Country as the friends of the "sullen peopled, half devil and half child," and the forwarders of Anglo-Saxon dominion.

THE poet is bitterly ironic, but he sees "duty a dead sure thing," whatever may be the difficulties on the road. The White Man's Burden must not be shirked.

Take up the White Man's burden—

The savage wars of peace—
Fill full the mouth of Famine,
And bid the sickness cease;
And when your goal is nearest
(The end for others sought)
Watch sloth and heathen folly
Bring all your hope to nought!

Take up the White Man's burden,

And reap his old reward—
The blame of those ye better,
The hate of those ye guard—
The cry of hosts ye humour
(Ah, slowly!) toward the light:—
"Why brought ye us from bondage,
Our loved Egyptian night?"

For its immediate effect, this new poem takes rank with the "Recessional." Mr. Kipling may sometimes be cryptic, but as Imperialist he has hit upon the simplest way of reaching the people's intellectuals.

LAST week we quoted the lines written by Mr. Kipling to accompany a gift of his books to his friend Captain Robley D. Evans. Therein he paid the Captain certain compliments, contrasting his naval prowess very favourably with the work of artist and author. But the critic is abroad, and even so casual a piece of verse, never intended for print, must be reviewed and corrected. Says Mr. Leonard Bell, writing to the Pall Mall Gazette: "Mr. Kipling must not damn with faint praise my old friend, Captain Robley D. Evans, whose yarn about whaling in the Mozambique so many of us enjoyed when he visited Bermuda in the U.S.S. Saratoga in 1878. I don't know whether Captain Evans sits in his conning-tower. I imagine he stands in it, but I am not sure. But it is no compliment to Captain Evans to say that he can 'handle a ten-inch gun to carry seven mile.' Let us alter the words to read 'To hit at over a mile.' It is a deadly insult to ask a man how far his guns will carry. He will answer you solemnly: 'They will penetrate so many inches of such and such armour at so many thousand yards.' And Captain Evans would not claim to be able to hit at a seven-mile range in ordinary weather." These conscientious commentators!

SOME few months ago Mr. Heinemann announced a book to be called Via Lucis, by Kassandra Vivaria; and in the preliminary paragraph with which, after the kindly habit of publishers, he furnished the press, he stated that the author would never see her work in print, for she was about to enter a nunnery and there immure herself for ever more. But circumstances alter cases, for when the novel—a remarkable one—appeared, the author appeared too, despite Mr. Heinemann's interesting prophecy, and received the congratulations of the readers of the book. And now, so far from abiding by the original statement concerning her, Donna Magda Stuart Sindici, for that is Kassandra Vivaria's real name, is about to unite with Mr. Heinemann in the bonds of marriage. Who shall say that romance has departed from life, especially the publishing life? The ceremony will be solemnised in Rome on the 21st inst.

A WELL-KNOWN American writer at present residing in this country, who has done some notable work as special correspondent, recently received a startling offer from a well-known New York journal. He was (says the Bookman) to proceed at once to Devil's Island, rescue Dreyfus, and bring him to New York. The payment was fixed at a thousand pounds, to be increased to three thousand if the expedition were successful, and five thousand for expenses. The offer was refused.

It was the New York Bookman that first gave publicity to the quatrain quoted by us a few weeks ago, praising Poe to the depreciation of Boker, Tabb, Longfellow, and Bryant—the verses being credited to Mr. Dobson, and by him since repudiated. We now learn from the Bookman that the author was Mr. Lang, who must have been enjoying the fun resulting from the false ascription. Father Tabb took the joke in good part and sent to the Bookman the following retort:

TO MR. AUSTIN DOBSON.

Dear Sir,—It is a cruel stab,
With Edgar Poe to measure Tabb,
As well with Tennyson to rate
The present poet-laureate.

A Mr. Newton Macmillan also replied, but less amusedly. He wrote:

I wonder when wee Dobbie will find out
That, though we're "Yanks," we know our way about;
The ranking of our poets—we can fix it
Without the help of Austin's ipse dixit.

It remains now for Mr. Lang to produce another quatrain that shall compensate Mr. Dobson for undesired publicity and attack.

ROTHLEY TEMPLE, in Leicestershire, the birthplace of Lord Macaulay and of Sir G. O. Trevelyan, his nephew, was partially damaged by fire last week. "Macaulay," says his biographer, "occupied, by choice, a very small chamber on the ground floor, through the window of which he could escape unobserved while afternoon callers were on their way between the front floor and the drawing-room." Fortunately, the portion of the house most intimately associated with Macaulay escaped harm.

A CONVERSATION, turning on autobiography, between Miss M. A. Dickens, the granddaughter of the novelist, and Mr. B. L. Farjeon, which appears in the Windsor Magazine, contains a very pleasant picture of the world-wide popularity of Charles Dickens. We give the passage in Mr. Farjeon's own words :

I was in New Zealand at the time [thirty years ago] editing a daily paper in a little bit of a town-ship. There were only 18,000 inhabitants, but we published every day as much matter as would fill the Daily Telegraph. Well, I wrote a little Christmas story, called "Shadows on the Snow," and I dedicated it to Charles Dickens and sent him a copy, I think with a little note. Time passed on until May came. In a bit of a town like ours it's almost like a big family, you know. Everybody knows everybody and everybody's affairs. We had only a little wooden post-office, carried on in a free and easy way, and one morning, when I went down to my business, everybody I met stopped me and said : "What's Charles Dickens writing to you about?" "What's Charles Dickens got to say to you?" "There's a letter for you from Charles Dickens!" I was very much excited, as you can understand, and I hurried into my office, and there it lay—the envelope with "Charles Dickens" signed on it—he always signed his name outside his letters, you know. That letter decided me. I had always had half a mind to go in and make a bid for fame, and it decided me. I made up my mind to go to London.

Those people in the street, all brimming with the great news of a Dickens letter—they give the magic of the name very vividly.

THERE are also Dickens reminiscences in Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's autobiography in the Atlantic Monthly :

At a dinner at Charles Dickens's we met his intimate friend, John Forster, a lawyer of some note, later known as the author of a biography of Dickens. When we arrived, Mr. Forster was amusing himself with a small spaniel which had been sent to Mr. Dickens by an admiring friend, who desired that the dog might bear the name of Boz. Somewhat impatient of such tributes, Mr. Dickens had named it Snittel Timbury.

And again :

After dinner [at Forster's], while we were taking coffee in the sitting-room, I had occasion to speak to my husband, and addressed him as "darling." Thereupon Dickens slid down to the floor, and, lying on his back, held up one of his small feet, quivering with pretended emotion.

"Did she call him darling?" he cried.

THE writer of Literary Notes in Country Life, in commenting upon the statement in our columns that Mr. Ollivant, the author of Owd Bob, is an invalid, remarks : "There is something very touching in this statement, for the book is fragrant of the open air, and nothing is more plain in its every page than that, next, perhaps, to a gallant dog, the author rejoices in the sight of a lusty man, and sympathises in his hearty strength. The coincidence, however, is far from being unprecedented. Some of the most robust of muscular novels have been written by crippled men, and the best writer of our day on race-horses and their breeding, a man who prefers to remain anonymous, but attracts general attention whenever he writes, has been for many years confined to his room." A list of such authors—who remember emotion, and depict it so vividly in their enforced tranquillity—would be interesting. Stevenson may be said to be among them. Mr. Clark Russell, we believe, is debarred from exercise. Frank Smedley was small and very frail.

ANOTHER new word. To addresses on Dante, and Dante readings, in a certain centre of culture, come numbers of elderly ladies, who bring their knitting and sit receptive through lecture after lecture. Some irreverent minds among a recent audience were exercised for a fitting name for these devotees. "Why not Dantediluvians?" said one.

It is stated that Lawn Bank, the house at Hampstead where Keats wrote his "Ode to a Nightingale," is likely to be demolished unless someone saves it. A new road has already cut into the garden, and projected shops threaten to ruin it as a dwelling. It is suggested that the house and grounds should be publicly acquired. Are there sufficient "Keatsians"?

A MOST interesting sale of Sir Walter Scott relics will be held at Sotheby's on March 2. Among the lots will be one of 83 new letters, never yet published, written by Scott to his brother and his brother's wife, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Scott, between 1807 and 1832. In one of them he expresses his willingness to go to India in a situation under Dundas, as Governor, notwithstanding that it would mean pitching "the Court of Session and the booksellers to the Devil." We may be thankful that the appointment was conferred elsewhere. For these treasures there should be spirited bidding among the publishers, to say nothing of collectors.

MR. WILLIAM CANTON, whose W. V.'s Golden Legend (here called A Child's Book of Saints) is having popularity in America, was recently asked if W. V. and The Boy were real characters or figments of his imagination. He replied : "W. V. (Winifred Vida) is a very real person. At least, the phenomenon of her has persisted now for eight and a half years, and I don't think that the most inveterate philosopher would contest her probable permanence and actuality. If he had to pay for her boots, at any rate, the last doubt as to her reality would be promptly dissipated. The Boy, too, is as uproariously objective as a person of two years can be. He is very sympathetic and affectionate, and if he does not distinguish himself as a postman or message boy when he grows up, he will probably command the British fleet, whence you will gather that he is versatile, active and imperious—with large possibilities in front of him."

In a recent Prize Competition our readers were asked to name books which seemed to them to be most needed. The prize was awarded for the suggestion of a history wherein the contemporary history of the various nations of the world could be seen at a glance. In connexion with this suggestion we have received the following letter from Dr. Jonathan Hutchinson :

A friend has drawn my attention to p. 137 of the ACADEMY, where, under the heading of "Books that are Wanted," "A Skeleton History of the World" is mentioned. He thinks, and to some extent I share his opinion, that my book, The Centuries, is very much what your correspondent desires. I have asked my publishers to send you a copy for your inspection and possibly for your use. Many have assured me that they find it a very useful book of reference for the library table.

Should you mention it, I am quite willing that my name should be given, although it was published anonymously. Its authorship is no longer a secret.

IAN MACLAREN is fortunate in his eulogists. At any rate, they do not lack fervour. Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, writing of Afterwards in a magazine, says: "I am not afraid to prophesy that it will be read and loved for a generation of years. I call it a great story, and have no fear that I shall be called upon to retract the adjective. The characterisation is a mirror of dazzling intensity, and the motif is a chariot of holy fire. The story deals with one of the great situations of human life, and touches it with a simplicity that gives it immortality. We read till our heartstrings snap, and then we read again."

THE committee in charge of the fund for the erection of a statue of Byron in Aberdeen, for which only £422 has been raised (towards £1,500 asked), has the consolation—if it is a consolation—of knowing that promoters of other Scottish memorials have also had difficulties to contend with. The response to the appeal for an R. L. Stevenson memorial was much less hearty than was expected, and everybody appears to have forgotten about the proposed Carlyle memorial for Edinburgh. Then there is the "National Burns Memorial and Cottage Homes" at Mauchline, a scheme which has been before the public since 1895. The memorial and homes have, it is true, been erected, but notwithstanding the most strenuous efforts, and in spite also of the "national" character of the memorial and of the poet, the whole of the £5,000 required to pay for them has not yet been scraped together. A sum of £4,500 has been gradually collected, but there remains a balance of £500 still to be raised, and another appeal—the latest of a long line—has just been issued. At present memorials and monuments do not appear to be in demand north of the Tweed.

IN introducing a new French periodical—L'Âme des Bêtes—to the notice of readers, the Paris correspondent of the Daily News gossips on the love of animals displayed by French literary men:

I can remember Lamartine and his dogs. He said of them, "They are at once my bodyguard and my friends. They read my thoughts, and conduct themselves accordingly." I also recollect Michelet and his white Angora cat. This beautiful creature twisted round his neck like a boa, and kept it warm in winter. When in cold weather he walked out, he kept his hands in the wide sleeves of his overcoat as in a muff. The cat was rolled up in them. George Sands loved birds, but she did not care for domestic animals. Old Dumas was the friend of all animals that would respond to his friendship, and especially of dogs. He had some sea-gulls that really stood high in the intellectual scale. Renan did not care for dogs, unless for a darling poodle of his wife's; but he was devoted to cats, which he thought the best models of deportment. Dumas filis disliked the dog, but was full admiration for the cat. Pierre Loti confesses friendship for his cats. They understand him, and he them. They are not intrusive, or awkward, or brusque in their ways, and are most at home in a snugly luxurious salon. M. Coppée prefers cats to dogs. They are more discreet, and he finds they are just as friendly if well treated. M. Coppée's actual pet cat is a young Angora that sits motionless on his desk when he writes. Were he to go on writing for hours, there it would stay. It walks among his scattered sheets of MS, never disturbing them, and does not set its paws down on writing that is not dry.

English authors, with exceptions, are more disposed to dogs. But Mr. Swinburne, we believe, adores cats.

THE Author gives as an illustration of the decay of the book trade a quotation from a circular issued by a firm of booksellers in Bradford. "Bookselling," they say, "has been very unremunerative for many years past, and as we require the room for our quickly increasing stationery trade, we have decided to give up bookselling altogether." The Author's correspondent adds: "There are 300,000 inhabitants in this city. There is not one shop now selling new books and nothing else. And there is only one second-hand bookseller."

THIS was the Chronicle's humorous story for Tuesday of this week:

The following shows how it is possible to make money by publishing even a first book of poems. A budding poet took this step—at his own cost, needless to say—and was agonised when good-natured friends said, "You'll be half ruined." At last, in fear and trembling, he wrote to the publisher to know the worst (which he calculated at £70). "Let me know how many of the edition have gone off," ran his humble epistle, "and what is the balance I owe you." The publisher wrote back: "Dear Sir,—Your whole edition has gone off, leaving a balance of £25 in your favour; cheque enclosed." The poet was delighted. He rushed to the publishers to obtain particulars of the unexpected sale. "My dear Sir, I think you had better not ask." "Not ask. Why not? You wrote to say the edition had all been sold; it must have been sold to somebody." "Pardon me. I wrote that it had 'gone off'; so it had, the whole of it. There was a fire in the warehouse, and the contents were insured."

CONCERNING the critics of his criticism of John Halifax, Gentleman, E. A. B. writes: "Mr. Shaylor desires to be informed what I meant when I said that had John Halifax 'been warmed at the Divine Fire it might have ranked as one of the books of the century.' I should have thought the phrase moderately clear; but perhaps it may be clearer to certain minds if, instead of 'warmed at the Divine Fire,' I substitute 'inspired by the imagination of genius.' The protesting letters which my article has called forth go to show how profound and widespread is the belief that against popularity there can be no appeal, that popularity is, in fact, sacred." This reply must end the discussion.

"In an article on 'Toplady as Literature,' in the last issue of the ACADEMY," writes E. S. N., "you state that the Roman Church stands alone in the doctrine of free-trade in hymns, and even discards the 'Lead, Kindly Light' 'of its own great son.' The accompanying leaflet, containing Newman's well-known hymn, with 'A Prayer for the Light of Truth,' published by the Catholic Truth Society, speaks to the contrary. That the Church which you call 'Roman' does not discard the writings (ceteris non obstantibus) of those outside its fold, is proved also by the fact that Henry Newman's Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine was not only allowed to appear without being revised by the proper authorities, but that the writer's offer—made after his joining the Catholic Church—to submit the Essay to a revision, was declined on the ground that it would come before the reader in a more persuasive form if he read it as the author wrote it."

Bibliographical.

A NEW novel from the pen of Mr. Hamilton Aidé—it is quite like old times. Unless I am much mistaken, Mr. Aidé's first story was called Confidences, and appeared in 1859. Then came Carr of Carrlyon, and Mr. and Mrs. Faulconbridge, and The Marstons, and In that State of Life, and Penruddocke—all of them much read in their day. For Mr. Aidé's later tales I cannot say so much. In the sixties and the seventies there was not so keen a competition among novelists as there has been since. On one of his works of fiction Mr. Aidé founded, I believe, his comedy of "A Nine Days' Wonder," in which Mrs. Kendal used to be so good. Then, not so very long ago, Mr. Aidé cropped up again as the adapter (from the French) of the farcical piece called "Dr. Bill." His first work was a book of verse. All of which goes to show that Mr. Aidé is a man of versatile powers, in which respect he is quite one of the old school. In our fathers' time versatility was more common than it is now.

I said something the other day about the late Mr. F. T. Palgrave's pretensions to be called a poet. I have just come across a letter which he addressed to me some twenty years ago, and in which he made frank reference to his rhythmic performances. He described certain of his pieces as "only rather fluent verse, without any of the inner life of poetry." And he went on to say: "To judge by the sale of my lyrics, which is about ten copies a year, I fear that to this 'inner life' I can have no real claim." This, perhaps, is too disparaging an estimate. Personally, I have always had a hearty liking for at least two of his pieces: that pretty, tender love-song beginning—

Ask what you will, my own and only love, and the two stanzas "To a Child." But, certainly, if Palgrave was a poet, he was only a "minor" one.

That "amoosin' cuss," Mr. "Arthur Pendenys," makes a quaint remark re the publication of the text of plays. "Good little plays," he says, "should be seen, and not read." That they are read, however, is made clear by the success which has attended the issue of the dramatic works of Mr. Pinero and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones. Mr.

Jones's plays are coming quite thick upon us. The other day "The Tempter," "The Rogue's Comedy," and "The Masqueraders," and to-day "The Physician"; I find that Mr. Jones has published no fewer than eight of his stage productions. And "The Triumph of the Philistines" and "The Middleman" are to follow shortly. I presume "The Dancing Girl" will not come until Mr. Jones has re-written that very poor fourth act. Best of all his work, perhaps, is "The Liars," which is still (so far as the public is concerned) in MS. I possess, I am happy to say, a privately printed copy.

It was very amiable of the Quarterly Reviewer to come down from his pedestal and tell us something about Isa Blagden and L. M. Little. Apparently he regards the late Mr. W. E. Gladstone as an authority on poetry; which leads me to suspect that perhaps the writer of "Some Women Poets" is identical with the Quarterly sage who pronounced Mr. W. S. Gilbert the most notable of living bards. I remember all about Miss Blagden now; the magic word "Browning" recalled it. But ought not Miss Blagden to be regarded as a novelist rather than as a poet? Did she not publish some half-dozen stories between 1861 and 1869? Was she not for a long time best known as "the author of Agnes Tremorne"? It was, I suppose, the Poems of 1873 that captivated the Quarterly Reviewer.

Has anybody yet pointed out that Mr. Maurice Hewlett is a poet by heredity? Among the publications of his father, Mr. Henry Gay Hewlett, were at least two volumes of verse—A Sheaf of Verse (1877) and A Wayfarer's Wallet (1888), neither of which, however, startled the world into attention. In truth, it may be assumed that the elder Mr. Hewlett will go down to posterity mainly, if not wholly, as the editor of the Autobiography of H. F. Chorley, and as the editor, also, of Chorley's National Music of the World. The said Autobiography, though little read (I suspect), is nevertheless eminently readable.

Those who have perused Miss Betham-Edwards's story, A Storm-Rent Sky, will not be in the least surprised that a French writer should have decided to base a play upon it. Nothing more natural. The central figure of A Storm-Rent Sky is the famous Danton, who is presented to us in quite engaging fashion, and should make a very good hero of melodrama—a much better hero, I should say, than Robespierre. We have had Marat, of course, in the plays dealing with Charlotte Corday.

So we are to have a Pocket Magazine, are we? Well, it will by no means be the first of its name or kind. There is record of a Pocket Magazine produced so long ago as 1794; and it would seem that the Pocket Magazine of Classic and Polite Literature, started in 1818, lasted (with abbreviated title from 1827 onwards) till 1833. There is record, further, of a Pocket Magazine or Literary Gleaner as existing in 1819-20.

It would appear that "George Egerton" contemplates putting a dangerous trap in the way of the unsuspecting Cockney. Announcement is made of a novel from her pen, to be entitled The Hazard of the Ill. What will the man in the street—if it catches his eye—make of that?

The Verney Memoirs. Vol. IV. Compiled by Margaret M. Verney. (Longmans.)

THE fourth volume of the Verney Memoirs, written with such singular grace, patience, and historic sense by the present Lady Verney, extends from the Restoration to the very eve of the eighteenth century. Less occupied with tragic affairs of State than some of its predecessors, it is no whit behindhand in all the qualities of domestic and sentimental interest. To say of a history that it is as interesting as a novel is, perhaps, scant praise; but the truth is, that this intimate chronicle, drawn from the yellowing papers in a real archive room, of life once actually lived, reminds us of nothing so vividly as of the deliberate photographic presentment of a society removed from Sir Ralph Verney's by the space of a hundred years, which Jane Austen has left us in the pages of half-a dozen masterpieces. So close comes genius to nature, for the precise effect which in Jane Austen is due to art springs in the "Verney Memoirs" precisely from their artlessness, from the innocence, the complete absence of arrière-pensée, of the every-day letters and account books that furnish their material.

As in the Commonwealth, so at the Restoration, the centre of things at Steeple Claydon is Sir Ralph Verney, the old Parliament man, the son of the standard bearer who fell for Charles. Puritan by instinct and training, there must have been much in the new order of things which did not please Sir Ralph; but the reaction of manners and morals under Charles II. had but little effect on the country districts, and the revels and wantonings of Whitehall reach Steeple Claydon merely as echoes and distant gossip. Sir Ralph's numerous London correspondents regale him occasionally with some anecdote of the times. Dr. Denton describes how neighbour Digby did upon a wager of £50 undertake to walk (not to run a step) 5 miles on Newmarket course in an houre, but he lost it by half a minute, but he had y^e honor of good company, y^e Kinge & all his nobles to attend & see him doe it stark naked (save for a loincloth) & barefoot;

and how the Queen, for a joke, in a disguise rid behind one to Newport (I thinke Faire) neare Audley Inne to buy a paire of stockins for her sweethart; y^e Dutchesse of Monmouth, Sr Bernard Gascoigne & others were her comrads.

More serious matter is sometimes the burden of these letters. Lady Hobart writes from her house in Chancery-lane with the Great Fire of London blazing at Baynard's Castle within a few hundred yards of her:

Thar was never so sad a sight nor so dolefull a cry hard, my hart is not abell to express the tenth nay the thousandth part of it, thar is all the carts within ten mils roud, & cars & drays run about night & dy, & thousens of men & women carrying burdens.

Sir Ralph is getting an old man, and the claims of his somewhat troublesome family take up much of his time; but he sits once more in Parliament, and gets black looks from My Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys for opposing him in Bucks politics, and in the end lives to see a second Revolution, and to join with the other county squires in welcoming in Dutch William. To the last of his days the resolute, self-confident, dictatorial, but, on the whole, kindly hearted man is master of his family and of his surroundings generally. Naturally, however, the sentimental interest slips away to another generation, and especially to the household of his eldest son, Edmund or "Mun" Verney, of whose philanderings with Mary Eure a former volume has told. Edmund Verney is not such a man as his father: an indolent, good-natured fellow, and but little a man of the world, for all his French polish, he grows fat and gouty for want of employment, while his estate dwindles and becomes burdened with debt through his shiftlessness and ill-management. There is a sadder tragedy than this in his life. He marries Mary Abell, heiress of the White House at East Claydon, whose lands march with his father's. Soon after her marriage the poor lady becomes moody and hysterical. "Zelotypia," writes Dr. Denton, "is gott into her pericranium, & I doe not know what will gett it out." She quarrels with those about her, becomes slovenly in her manners and indecorous in her speech. "She gos out with her mayd to Linsendend Chapell. They goo so lick trampis, so durty 'tis a sham to see them." She thinks herself bewitched, and accuses Lady Hobart of having an evil eye. "Ephsome waters," then coming into fashion, are prescribed, and presently she is better, and is working "a dimity bed in gren cruells." There are three children, and then the cloud comes upon Mary Verney and her house again. She lives many years, outlives her husband and all her children, and dies at last, as the parish books recall, in the seventy-fourth year of her age. "She was the Relict of Edmund Verny, Esq^r . . . who for several years, xxx, was very Melancholy, during her husband's life . . . & continued soe 27 years after his decease, Lady of this Manor; and notwithstanding her lunacy shee was a Woman of Extraordinary Goodness, Piety & Devotion."

An interesting chapter is made up of the letters between Edmund Verney and his younger son, also an Edmund, during the lad's days as a fellow-commoner at Trinity College, Oxford. He starts off gaily with his "new sylver-hilted sword, his new striped Morning gown," and his "6 new laeed Bands, whereof one is of Point de Loraine." But, as is not unknown among modern undergraduates, he soon finds that his costume is not quite in the latest mode.

MOST HONOURED FATHER,—I want a Hatt, and a payre of Fringed Gloves very much, and I Desire you to send them me if you can possibly before Sunday next, for as I Come from Church everybody gazeth upon me and asketh who I am. This I was Told by a friend of Myne, who was asked by Two or Three who I was.

He gets his hat, and doubtless his fringed gloves, and a silver seal engraved with his arms into the bargain. Presently he bespeaks a new table and cane chairs, and the father, as fathers will, turns restive.

I Do not understand why you should Bee at that unnecessary Charge, as long as you Have that wch. will serve y^r turne, neither Do I like the Vanity. You do not tell me whether you are matriculated yet or noe, and I am impatient till I know Thats done. You say you want money, weh. I will supply you with very shortly, but not to Lay out in Vaine moveables, and so God blesse you.

The undergraduate's elder brother dies, and he becomes the heir, and pious letters, formal of phraseology, but breathing of tenderness beneath, pass between father and son. Presently the lad distinguishes himself in his studies and is to speak verses in the theatre; but there is a fear lest the small-pox, which is in the college, may prevent him. The father writes:

CHILD,—I pray when you speak in the Theatre doe not speak like a mouse in a chees for that will be a great shame instead of an honour, but speak out your words holdly and distinctly and with a grave confidence, and be sure to articulate your words out of y^r mouth Soe that every body may heare them playnly.

The next letter contains even more amusing and equally sound advice:

CHILD,—I heard that the players are gon down to Oxford, but I am unwilling that you should go to see them act, for fear on your coming out of the hot play house into the cold ayer, you should catch harm, for as I did once coming out of the Theatre at a publick Act when it was very full and stiaming hot, and walkin a Broad in the cold, and gave me sutch a cold that it had Lik^t to a cost me my Life. Your best way in Sutch a cold is to go hom to your own Chamber directly from the play house, and drink a glass of Sack, therefour Be sure you send your Servant At your hand for a bottle of the Best Canary and Keep it in your chamber for that purpose. Be sure you drink no Kooling tankord nor no Cooling drinks what so ever . . . harkon Thou unto the voyce & Advise of mee thy ffather, Loving Thee Better than him selfe, EDMUND VERNEY.

After all, the verses do not get spoken, for Bishop Fell—the hero of the famous lines

I do not like you, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell, &c.—

dies, and Act, or Commemoration, as it is now called, is put off. In the autumn the scholar gets into trouble. His tutor writes that he comes not to afternoon lecture, and will give no reasons. Still worse, he “lay out of the College on Wednesday night last.” In fact, it is clear that the authorities were reluctantly going to send him down, when the small-pox breaks out again, the whole college is dismissed, and Mr. Verney's particular matter blows over. He goes up again with his father's advice to avoid “Damed Company,” gets his accounts into disorder, strains his arm wrestling, buys “a Cravat Ribbon of any modest colour,” wants to learn “Chymistry” (which his father confuses with alchemy), does learn to fence and exercise the pike and musket, and forgets to send home the desired news of Magdalen College, then, in the days of James the Second's persecution, the cynosure of every political eye. The happy, careless life, so little different in essentials from the undergraduate life of our own day, comes to a sad and sudden end. The elder Edmund dies suddenly in his sleep. His estate is in disorder, and the tale of his debts draws words of unusual bitterness from the austere and mortified Sir Ralph:

I finde y^r Brother died very much in debt [Sir Ralph writes again to Johu], but as yet I cannot say how much, therefore in my opinion it will be the best way to bury him privately in the night-time, without Escutcheons, or inviting of Neighbourss to attend with their Coaches, which is very troublesome & signifies nothing.

The younger Edmund comes home to take up the burden of his inheritance, but in less than two years he, too, is dead of a fever caught in town. And so old Sir Ralph has outlived two generations of those who should have been his heirs when the day comes for him who so long has been the mainstay and prop of his family and his country to receive his own quietus. He has left orders for a very private burial, but they hang with black “the entry from the Hall door to the Spicery door, and the best Court Porch, likewise the Brick Parlour from top to bottom,” and “the rooms looked very handsomly, though the Heavens wept with all his relations at his funeral.”

So ends one of the books fullest of humanity and entertainment with which we are acquainted. We trust that the good old Verney habit of keeping private letters did not end with the seventeenth century, and that Lady Verney will some day trace for us the fortunes of this typical English family through yet another age.

When America was Young.

Home Life in Colonial Days. By Alice Morse Earle.
(Macmillan.)

THIS is one of the most refreshing books that we have read for many a day. Mrs. Earle could not have foreseen how timely and gracious its appearance at this moment would become. Just when the Old country and the New are being drawn together by blood and circumstance she gives us a wonderful reconstruction of the home life of those first English colonists who were the first Americans. It was the home life of England in part transplanted and in part remodelled, inspired by hope yet consumed with regret. You cannot read this book without a thrill. England had the power to deny bread and liberty to her children, but she could not sequester their English instincts and wholesomeness of heart. Like good seed carried on the wind, the exiles no sooner touched earth than they took root. And this is the intimate story of their rooting and upgrowth. We behold them hewing their wood and drawing their water, fashioning their drinking cups and spinning their wool, forging their tools and appliances, building their boats and trolleys, and re-making England with tears and laughter.

They re-made it so fast that the day of small beginnings seems infinitely remote. Hence these pages breed astonishment by their wealth of minutiae. Mrs. Earle has photographed and described the very pots and pans, the lamps and jack-knives, the table-ware and fowling-pieces of the pioneers. She takes us to their firesides and gives us their cider to drink; shows us the needlework of their girls, and empties the drawers and wardrobes of the mothers. In all we feel the pathos of that enforced new start in life. We see a civilised people set down to begin life without many tools, without shops, or imports, or roads, or bricks, or stores of metal, or protecting soldiers. Everything had to be made, and to be made under difficulties. How significant is the fact that when a colonist left his wooden house he burned it down in order that he might recover the nails from its ashes.

Yet there was nothing mean or niggling about these new-made homes. The best that was possible was found in them, and every arrangement revealed a homely science. The kitchen fireside of a settler was of triumphant size, a challenge to the climate, and a citadel of warmth to which the family retired when the day's toil no longer kept blood in quick circulation. We read of fire-places so huge that the fore-logs and back-logs for the fire were dragged into the kitchen by a horse, or run into it on a hand-sled. "Often there were seats within the chimney on either side. At night children could sit on these seats and there watch the sparks fly upward and join the stars which could plainly be seen up the great chimney-throat." Above the fire, resting on ledges on either side of the lower chimney, ran the back-bar, or lug-pole, from which the great iron and brass pots hung pendant over the fire on "pot-hooks" and "pot-brakes" and "gallows-crooks." The lug-pole was of green wood, and would stand the heat for a long time, until at last it collapsed, causing maybe the ruin of a dinner, and sometimes a death. Iron back-bars came in due season. No wonder that toasting-forks and waffle-irons had "long adjustable handles which helped to make endurable the blazing heat of the great logs." For the same reason there hung on a nail a pair of pipe-tongs wherewith the New Englander lifted an outlying coal to light his pipe. The pots were tremendous—the great iron one, in which all the vegetables were boiled, sometimes weighing forty pounds. "Over the fire-place and across the top of the room were long poles on which hung strings of peppers, dried apples, and rings of dried pumpkin. And the favourite resting-place of the old queen's-arm, or fowling-piece, was on hooks over the kitchen fire-place. . . . Chafing-dishes and skimmers of brass and copper were also cheerful discs to reflect the kitchen firelight."

Imagination does not stoop to trace the kitchen splendours of those days. Rather she rises, on envious wings, to inspect the utensils of the housewives of New England. Behold these skilllets, and rabbit-broilers, and braziers, and grid-irons, all fitted with legs so that they might stand at a safe height in the red hot humus of coals and glowing wood on the fire-place. Even a toasting-fork was not always held in the hand, but approached the fire on spindling legs of its own. Behold these and irons of goose-neck pattern, and this shining Dutch oven, and this curious bake-kettle. The last is a shut-up urn to be buried in the heart of the fire. "Such perfect rolls, such biscuit, such shortcake as issued from the heaped-up bake-kettle can never be equalled by other methods of cooking." We believe this from our soul. Although these great fire-places soon shrank in size, many are still left, and we owe pictures of their delights to such modern poets as Lowell and Whittier. Whittier's "Snow-bound" is the final chronicle and eulogy of the old colonial kitchen and all that it meant. Its poetic fire was snatched from an oak log.

We piled with care our nightly stack
Of wood against the chimney-back—
The oaken log, green, huge, and thick,
And on its top the stout back-stick ;

The knotty fore-stick laid apart,
And filled between with curious art
The ragged brush ; then hovering near
We watched the first red blaze appear,
Heard the sharp crackle, caught the gleam
On whitewashed wall and sagging beam,
Until the old, rude-furnished room
Burst, flower-like, into rosy bloom.

It were a filial disrespect to think that because the colonists ate from wooden trenchers, and poured new milk into leathern jacks, and dispensed with forks and saucers, they were therefore rude in their table manners. Mrs. Earle shows that they taught their children a discreet behaviour, as not to sit down to table until grace was said, not to ask for anything on the table, not to bite into a whole slice of bread, and not to throw bones on the floor. "Hold not thy knife upright," ran one code, "but sloping ; lay it down at right-hand of the plate, with end of blade on the plate. . . . Look not earnestly at any other person that is eating." Even adults were instructed in the diction and forms of serving and carving food. Mrs. Earle quotes these upbraiding words from an old author :

How all must regret to hear some Persons, even of quality, say "Pray cut up that Chicken or Hen," or "Halve that Plover," not considering how indiscreetly they talk, when the proper terms are "break that Goose," "thrust that Chicken," "spoil that Hen," "pierce that Plover." If they are so much out in common Things, how much more would they be with Herons, Cranes, and Peacocks ?

The preparing and serving of meals make four-fifths of the work of a home in an old country. In the American colonies there were twenty primitive occupations. Making candles was one of them. The first colonists used the pine knots of pitch-pine, "candle-wood" as it was called. These pine torches gave no bad light, and we are told that the Rev. Mr. Newmau, of Rehoboth, compiled his great Concordance of the Bible with no better illuminant. Soon tallow candles were made by the careful housewife :

CANDLE-DIPPING IN OLD COLONIAL DAYS.

it was an autumn task in every well-regulated home. The wicks were of closely spun hemp or tow or cotton, and the molten tallow bubbled in huge kettles slung from the lug-pole. As our illustration shows, the wicks were hung perpendicularly from short rods, and were alternately dipped and allowed to dry until they became clothed in tallow to the required thickness. Tin and pewter moulds were also used.

There was a whole series of "home-spun industries." Flax was grown, dried, ripple-combed, cleaned, broken on the flax-brake, singled with a swingling-block and knife, spun into thread, skeined, and bleached in buttermilk. The spinning industry was of vital importance, and was fostered with great care. Prizes were given for quantity and quality. "At the fourth anniversary, in 1749, of the Boston Society for Promoting Industry and Frugality, three hundred 'young spinsters' spun on their wheels on Boston Common. And a pretty sight it must have been: the fair young girls in the quaint and pretty dress of the times, shown to us in Hogarth's prints, spinning on the green grass under the great trees." Wool-spinning was just as active. The colonists scorned to import woollen cloth, and denied themselves mutton that they might have wool. They soon had wool in such quantities, and prepared it so well, that the mother country took alarm, and forbade the importation of colonial worsteds, kerseys, serges, and what not. Colonial woollen cloth was dyed in many colours: dyed to glorious reds with cochineal and logwood, dyed brown with the bark of hickory, dyed green in the juice of golden-rod mixed with indigo, dyed orange with the bark of sassafras, dyed black with field sorrel, dyed crimson in the juice of the pokeberry, dyed yellow with the petals of Jerusalem artichoke. What processes! What household arts! What cheerful days of toil and reward! Woven linen was exchanged at the village store for sugar, spices, and tea, or sold for forty-two cents a yard. Blankets, bed-coverlets, grain-bags, and all-wool coats were woven everywhere. To this day there survives in Narragansett one of the last of this race of weavers. Mrs. Earle has told the story of Weaver Rose and his family in her book, Old Narragansett. Rose's pattern book is more than a hundred years old, and he lets slip the technical words of Elizabethan craftsmen.

We resign the attempt to indicate the multifariousness of home life in the American colonies a hundred years ago. Mrs. Earle's industry has been equal to the task, and in one chapter alone—that on "Girls' Occupations"—she makes us wonder how the day could be long enough for the day's employments. A well-taught girl could raise small stock, do dairy work, go marketing, sew, knit, pickle and preserve, make a broom of guinea wheat, pleat and iron, pick live geese without wincing, scour pewter, boil fat into soap, plait straw into hats, work on a netted purse or Job's Trouble quilt, and still find time to read Doddridge's sermons and confer with her sweetheart. And she did but bear her girlish part in the Arcadian economy. We cannot distil any more essences from these charming pages. Fitly enough, Mrs. Earle ends with a chapter on "Old-time Flower Gardens," so that her fragrant book is dissolved in fragrance.

An Adventuress on the Throne.

Marysiencka. By K. Waliszewski. Translated by Lady Mary Loyd. (Heinemann.)

LADY MARY LOYD, already favourably known as the translator of the fascinating previously unpublished letters of the great Napoleon, has now given us an excellent rendering of a very clever book by a Gallicised Pole. M. Waliszewski claims that his work is an experiment in historical style. Such it doubtless is to the French public. But (whether M. Waliszewski be aware of it, or whether it be a curious coincidence) to the English public it has a derivation. It is a polite, a smoothed, a French adaptation of Carlyle's historical methods; or of some of Carlyle's methods. The introduction of dramatic conversations, based on actual letters or documents, is its main innovation. And this is a distinctive feature of Carlyle's Frederick the Great. The result is very bright and lively, if it lack the depth, the richness, the genius of Carlyle. A work of undeniable talent, French to the finger-tips—in spite of the English parallel.

A Gallicised Pole, he has written the history of a Pole-bred Frenchwoman, who became queen of her adopted country. Marysiencka was the Polish pet-name super-induced upon her French name, Marie; and it is significant of the hybrid destiny of this singular adventuress. She was born into a picturesque period and a picturesque milieu; and her story makes picturesque reading. It was the late seventeenth century, the age of Charles II. and Mazarin and the young Louis XIV. She was the compatriot and contemporary of the Three Musketeers, and the Court which surrounded her first childhood was that depicted in Twenty Years After. To understand her character you must read Dumas. Not a Miladi, but, rather, a pretty Mme. de Chevreuse: her yearned-for paradise was the frivolous intrigues of Saint Germanis; her regretted destiny, to assist in making the history of Poland.

To complete the incongruous caprice of Fate, she became the wife of a mediæval warrior-hero born out of due time, who might have ridden horse to horse with Cœur-de-Lion at Acre, and shaken the beard of Sultan Saladin: she became the wife of Sobieski. An intrigante from the Court of Charles II. married to Hunniades or Scanderbeg would not be a more "amazing marriage."

She had astounding luck, which it can hardly be said she deserved, and with which she was never contented. Marie de la Grange d'Arquien (to give her full titular honour) was a daughter of a shady captain in Monsieur's Guard, who came of ancient but not very exalted family. She went to Poland as a child, in the suite of Marie de Gonzagne, when that restless schemer set out to marry the then King of Poland. Marie de Gonzagne took with her a bevy of French beauties who wanted Polish husbands—and got them. The little Marie d'Arquien, it was hoped, under the patronage of the new French Queen of Poland, might grow up to obtain a like desirable result—for Polish nobles were rich, and had a pretty taste for pretty faces. To her Poland was generous indeed: it gave her two husbands and a crown. Little could Marie de Gonzagne have guessed that the small d'Arquien was one day to sit on her own throne! The child had an evil training in an evil Court. The Court of Poland seems to have rivalled the French Court in corruption, if not in wit and polish. Marie de Gonzagne's second husband, John Casimir (the first soon died), was a monument of instability. He had been prince, monk, and cardinal; and had then unfrocked himself, and laid by the robes of cardinal for the robes of king, marrying his brother's widow. Marie de Gonzagne herself belonged to the school of Mme. de Chevreuse, Mme. de Longueville, and the dames galantes who intrigued with love and politics through the squables of the Fronde. Under her patronage, Mlle. d'Arquien grew up what might have been expected—selfish, luxurious, dissolute, with an incurable taste for backstairs plotting and scheming. Ardent and impetuous, her face was her fortune, and she played it for all it was worth. Everyone made love to her, Sobieski among the rest. But he was a parvenu, and she wanted riches and power; so under the prudent guidance of the Queen she married riches and power in the person of an old Polish noble. He turned out a drunken sluggard; Sobieski was a near neighbour, and presently she was heart and soul in an intrigue with him.

What followed is a cynical specimen of the manners of the Court. The Queen was as disappointed in the marriage as Marysiencka (the Polish name is convenient) herself was. She wanted a leader for the Court party, and had hoped to secure it by the match; but an inert toper was useless. Lubomirski, leader of the National party, a kind of shuffling Warwick, was threatening her with arms over her scheme for French succession to the Crown. She fixed on Sobieski as her only hopeful champion. Through Marysiencka she could influence Marysiencka's lover; therefore, as she had blessed the marriage, she blessed the intrigue, and took it under her royal wing. Charming morals! The husband, like a good fellow, at this precisely proper moment gracefully died, and left his shoes for Sobieski. Sobieski, however, seemed in two minds about stepping into them. His hesitation disconcerted the royal plans, which required that he should at once be made sure of; and the royal action was prompt. Marysiencka laid a disgraceful trap for him, which had been concocted by the Queen's own royal mind, in collusion with the French ambassador—a Bishop! Nor did Her Majesty disdain her personal assistance in the vile affair; thanks to which Sobieski was successfully duped into a private marriage—after a decent interval made into a public one. Delightful delicacy!

Having got her Sobieski, she tired of him, betrayed him, and whisked off to Paris, where it is not probable she was more faithful to his memory than she had been to his person. He complained, indeed, that she had lived almost wholly apart from him since their marriage. Poor man! Such was the tradition of the French Court. But John Sobieski, at any rate, was in earnest, and waged passionate epistolary war of entreaties and upbraidings against her. We do not share the author's taste for Sobieski's love-letters. They are curious and characteristic, but they like us not. Perfervid, sincere, grossly amatory, a singular mixture of high-flown expression with physical coarseness in feeling, they are the love-letters of an amative Tommy Atkins who has read Mlle. de Scudery—if you can conceive such a fabulous monster. But the crises of Sobieski's love-agony were exceedingly hard on the Turk. Instead of beating out his brains, he rushed to the field and knocked out the brains of the infidels; so that a cruel repulse by his wife was followed by a great victory over the Ottoman.

In this way Marysiencka may have been Sobieski's "gad-fly," in the Socratic phrase. But how else she helped him is not over-evident; how she thwarted him, too evident. The death of the Queen, followed by the abdication of John Casimir, left his way open to the throne; but her mind was fixed on French intrigue and French gold, she never saw the possibility to which a cleverer woman would have urged him. It was not French aid, to which she continually directed his attention, but his own sword that ultimately raised him to a dignity she was too short-sighted to foresee. The close of Michael's brief reign coincided with a brilliant victory over the Turks, which turned all thoughts on Sobieski as the national saviour; and his election was practically unopposed. The little d'Arquien intriguer was Queen of Poland. In that capacity she proved herself a superb marplot. If her husband had any large project of policy on hand, she cut across it with some petty intrigue for a petty personal end, and sent it to the ground. It was in no little degree owing to her that the sole great action of her husband's disappointing reign was the immortal relief of Vienna, which put an end to the expansion of Turkey, and set the name of John Sobieski among the heroes of Christendom. She ceased her infidelities, it is true, and became a much more tolerable wife. But she was growing old, and the time for infidelities was passed. After his death, she finished her career by dividing the family interest, and so preventing all chance of the crown remaining in Sobieski's family. Having thus ruined her sons and herself, she retired to Rome. Even there she finally contrived to quarrel with the Government; and at last ended her days, poor and overlooked, in her native France. For a more favourable view of her than ours, read M. Waliszewski's charming book, which says all that can be said, and without partiality. She was the victim of a bad Court, an unscrupulous patroness, and her own beauty, no doubt; but, like Louis XIV., we cannot like her.

"O Sovran Blanc!"

The Annals of Mont Blanc. By Charles Edward Mathews, sometime President of the Alpine Club. With a Chapter on the Geology of the Mountain by Prof. T. G. Bonney. (Fisher Unwin. 21s. net.)

THE unique charm of Mont Blanc lies in its surpassing grandeur and its wealth of associations. The mountaineer with a passion for adventure may no longer think it worthy of his steel, but he must continue to reverence it for its beauty, and as the cradle of the art he loves. The certain Dr. Paccard, who is believed by some to have played no less important a part than Balmat in the first ascent. The evidence is conflicting; but Mr. Mathews unhesitatingly pronounces for Paccard, and demands his rehabilitation. The first woman to reach the summit was the peasant Maria Paradis, in 1809; the next, in 1838, was Mlle. Henriette d'Angeville, who, it has been somewhat unfairly affirmed, "planted the flag of feminine alpinism." To modern women climbers Mr. Mathews refers without particularising. Can the Alpine Club be in danger?

The story of the early attempts on the mountain—successful and unsuccessful—and of the comparatively rare ascents during the next seventy years, is a story of extraordinary fascination; even though "everybody climbs Mont Blanc now," there is no longer any need for the making of wills at the start, or the holding of thanksgiving services on the return.

The change began in 1851, when the celebrated Albert Smith—whose initials Douglas Jerrold once said only expressed two-thirds of the truth—having managed to struggle to the top more dead than alive, came home and introduced Mont Blanc to the great British Public at the Egyptian Hall. The national imagination was touched, a fashion was set, and since then the mountain has been visited and climbed by an increasing number of people, not only from England, but from every part of the world. We believe that Mr. Mathews's book, in striking contrast as it is with Smith's panorama, will contribute towards a somewhat similar result, and, in addition to strengthening love already established, will prepare much new ground. Nor can there be any regret that this

THE SITE OF THE LAKE AFTER THE CATASTROPHE OF ST. GERVAIS.

"Annals" before us are little more than the story, gathered with infinite labour from a hundred obscure sources, of the first attempts to reach the summit. The name "Mont Blanc" appears for the first time in literature in 1744. Up to that time there is no record that the idea of climbing the mountain had ever been conceived; but, in 1760, a naturalist of Geneva, Horace Bénédict de Saussure, offered—in the interests of science—a tempting reward to the man who should find his way to the top, and, in 1786, Jacques Balmat, a Chamonix peasant, achieved the feat, and claimed the reward, and the following year fulfilled for M. de Saussure the dream of his life by leading him also to the summit. These two men are now commemorated in Chamonix by the well-known bronze, but it has always been a question whether at least a third of the honour is not due to a should be so. The chief use of mountains is to educate us—"to startle the lethargy of the human soul with the deep and pure agitation of astonishment"—and the more people that can be brought under their influence, whether by diligence or excursion train, in bivouac or hotel, the better for us all. Mr. Mathews and the older mountaineers bemoan the changed conditions; but they forget that emotion is largely coloured by association, and that a sunset from the comfortable bench of the Mulets, the untired start by moonlight across the waste of snows, the first gleam of gold on the Dôme, the welcome hospitality of the Valkot, the excitement of the ridge of the great Bosse in a wind biting shrewdly, the sublimity of the summit, can only leave in the mind of a man who has never known anything better unspeakable and ineffable memories.

Of course no concealment is made of the fact that Mont Blanc has claimed its victims. Guides and travellers, forty-seven men in all, have perished on it since the first accident in 1820—nearly all, if we may accept Mr. Mathews's authority, from the neglect of proper precautions. The generalisation is probably as sound in the mountains as elsewhere, and yet it will never satisfy the fearful. An avalanche that kills one man may be as much "an act of God"—as our fathers loved to call it—as the appalling disaster to which the illustration we reproduce refers, and which, according to Mr. Mathews himself, "could neither have been predicted nor averted."

"Owing to the stoppage of the sub-glacial drainage, in some manner never precisely ascertained," we read, "a lake was formed under the Tête Rousse glacier, in which an enormous body of water was pent up at a spot ten thousand feet above the sea level. Between one and two o'clock on the night of the twelfth of July, 1892, the ice that held up the lake gave way. The water swept in a torrent of tremendous force over the Désert de Pierre Ronde, gathering up thousands of tons of rock and stones in its course. It passed with a terrible roar under the hamlet of Bionnassay, which it did not injure, destroyed half the village of Bisnay, on the high road between Contamines and St. Gervais, and, tearing up trees by the roots as it went along, joined the main river of the Bon Nant; following its bed and destroying on its way the old Pont du Diable, it hurled its seething flood of water, timber, stones, and mud upon the solid buildings of the establishment [the Baths of St. Gervais], and crushed them into fragments; then crossing the Chamonix-road, it spread itself out in the form of a hideous fan over the valley of the Arve, destroying part of the village of Le Faget on its way. Such was the catastrophe of St. Gervais, which claimed more than a hundred and fifty victims."

Though it can hardly be hoped that human foresight will ever be able entirely to avert such catastrophes as this, the climber, it is urged, may safeguard himself by ordinary precautions. But in spite of all Mr. Mathews's eloquent pleading, these precautions will not always be taken, and men, even the most experienced, will continue to be killed—and in a better cause, it seems to us, than most of those who fall in battle.

The book is pleasantly written, paper and type leave nothing to be desired; the six electrotype reproductions of photographs by Signor Vittorio Sella are, with one exception, entirely worthy of the beautiful and majestic mountain they represent; the numerous other illustrations have historic, if not artistic interest; the map is good and clear; the science is adequate; and the appendices, especially the Bibliography and the Facsimile of Martel's Pamphlet, form a valuable addition to the volume.

Celtic Drama.

The Heather Field and Maeve. By Edward Martyn. With an Introduction by George Moore. (Duckworth)

THE weakness of Mr. George Moore, as a literary critic, lies in his failure to realise the importance for an artist of independence. Hence his extravagant laudation of Mr. W. B. Yeats's clever pastiche of Celtic dream in "The Secret Rose"; and hence he tells us now, almost in a breath, that Mr. Edward Martyn's "Heather Field" will "hold its own by the side of 'The Wild Duck,' or 'Macbeth,' or 'Hamlet,'"; and that it is "the first play written in English inspired by the examples of Ibsen." The second statement contains a truth. Mr. Martyn is at present of all things derivative: an echo, not an individual voice. He gives you the persistent symbolism of Maeterlinck, the eerie glamour and mystic whisperings of Mr. W. B. Yeats, the sordid settings—though, indeed, a touch of sordidness belongs to a certain side of the Irish temperament—of Ibsen himself. Therefore we discount Mr. Moore's praise, for which, indeed, we have a notion that Mr. Martyn himself must blush.

It is somewhat hard upon him to come into the world thus prefaced, for his work is by no means without merit. Both in "The Heather Field" and in "Maeve" the central theme—it is the same in both plays, the incompatibility of the idealist of dreams with real life—is well grasped and presented. In "The Heather Field" the idealist, Carden Tyrrell, has married a wife who sets to work to civilise him. He carries his idealism into the reclamation of a heather field on his estate; and this field, which ultimately breaks out into its native wildness and ruins him, becomes a symbol of his own untameable temperament. The poetry of the man is well brought out, and there is a good dramatic scene where his wife brings in the mad doctors to spy for signs of insanity in his imaginative talk. But Grace Tyrrell herself is surely theatrical in the bad sense. "Although all right and good sense are on the wife's side," says Mr. Moore, "the sympathy is always with Carden." Naturally, for the dice are loaded by making the wife an unnatural and vindictive shrew. Another weakness in the play is the number of slightly-sketched minor characters. This appears to be a concession less to the spirit of drama than to the convenances of a modern representation. But a tragedy, if it is to be truly tragic, must pass as nearly as possible in solitude. Numbers stifle it.

In "Maeve" the idealist heroine is to be married to an Englishman rich enough to restore the faded glories of the house of the O'Heynes, Prince of Burren. Up to the day of her wedding she dreams over the fairy lore of Erin, and in the white moonlight Queen Maeve—Queen Mab, we suppose—bears her off to the fairy cairn. There is some pretty writing.

MA. (wistfully): "He is the only one I have ever loved. Let me stay. I hear him coming."

FIN. (frightened): "You hear him —?"

MA. (pointing towards the abbey): "Yes, there—far away—coming on the wings of the March wind. Don't you hear?"

FIN.: "I hear the bitter wind, Maeve, through our old ash-trees."

MA. (smiling in reverie): "The fairy March wind which races at twilight over our fields, turning them to that strange pale beauty, like the beauty of a fairy's face—oh, it is fit that my beloved should ride on such a steed."

FIN.: "Dearest, you must go to rest. He will never come. He is dead."

MA.: "He is not dead. He will come. I know he will. But the way is long. A long—long way."

FIN.: "A long way, indeed, without beginning and without end."

MA.: "It began from the land of everlasting youth."

FIN.: "You have often told me of that land—Tirnan-oghe, is it not?"

MA.: "The Celtic dream-land of ideal beauty. There he lives in never-fading freshness of youth. (With a steadfast visionary look.) I am haunted by a boyish face, close-hooded, with short gold hair; and every movement of his slender, faultless body goes straight to my heart like a fairy melody. Oh, he has a long way to journey, for that land of beauty was never so far away as it is to-night!"

But the play would never "act." It has the worst of faults, an aurora borealis and a ghostly procession emerging to the sound of harps like vapour from the cairn. Even Celtic glamour will not survive a lime-light aurora borealis, and the kind of vaporous ghost that they make with gauze.

Celt, Saxon, and Norman.

The Foundations of England. By Sir James H. Ramsay of Banff, Bart., M.A. 2 vols. (Sonnenschein. 24s.)

SIX years ago Sir James Ramsay gave, in his Lancaster and York, an instalment, first in time, last in design, of an intended summary of the first fifteen hundred years of English history. Those volumes covered a period of precisely eighty-five years, and the prospect of the whole work, written upon such a scale, became sufficiently alarming. It is not to be so. Sir James Ramsay has turned from the end to the beginning of his task, and in another two volumes has polished off twelve of his fifteen centuries. The first of these deals with the origins, from the earliest glimmer of these islands in history down to the death of Edward the Confessor; the second takes up the tale of the Conquest, and pushes on through the four following reigns. Some two hundred and fifty years remain, and one may reasonably calculate that another four volumes at most will see the end of them. Even so, it will make a goodly work—the work of a lifetime; for before a line was published, the book had been on the stocks a full score of years. Obviously, we cannot, in the space at our command, attempt any detailed estimate or criticism of such a book; all that can be done is to indicate in the briefest fashion its chief qualities and its place among histories. That place will be, we think, rather that of a book of reference than anything else. Sir James Ramsay is a thoroughly learned and a thoroughly industrious man. He has worked over, with immense care, the masses of material, the innumerable special studies, bearing upon his subject. His analysis and summary of them is both careful and just. His book might serve for many years as a thread to hold together the results of later research. But that it will ever be, even in the better sense, popular, or that, when once it has ceased to be an adequate digest of the existing state of historical knowledge, it will endure, we do not believe. For it has not the saving grace of literary quality. Erudite as he is, Sir James Ramsay cannot write a bit. His composition and his phrasing are alike tedious, flat, and uninspired. Of the structural distinction between sentence and paragraph he has no conception. Life, colour, movement, picturesqueness, humour, enthusiasm, are not his. His volumes are most useful on the shelf, but they cannot be read. We defy anyone—except a reviewer—to read them straight through. Macaulay might have done it, for Macaulay read Guicciardini and Nares, or implies that he did; but, unfortunately, Macaulay is dead. It is fair to try Sir James Ramsay upon some of the occasions where the purple patch would be only reasonable. If you do it, you will find that Hastings fails, the White Ship fails, the death of Rufus fails, and that this is the characterisation of the Conqueror:

William the Great, as men of his time called him, was a man of wonderful parts, and accomplished many things; but he does not present a many-sided character for study. We have in him a most masterful man of blood and iron; of great intelligence, energy, and good sense; one who could be mean, but not petty; perfectly selfish, unshrinking in purpose, determined to win at all hazards, and absolutely reckless as to the means he might employ or the misery he might inflict in the pursuit of his ends. He was a man more hated than loved, probably even more feared than hated. In the words of the Peterborough writer, "he was over all measure stark (i.e., stern) to the men who withstood his will. . . . He recked naught of their hate; they must all follow his will if they would live or keep lands or goods." But William was not wantonly cruel or capricious. Whatever he did he did with a purpose and did it thoroughly. This was perhaps his best point as a ruler. Men knew what to expect, and the thoroughness of his measures in the end worked for humanity. His politic self-restraint was not less remarkable than his promptitude. As he knew when to strike, so also he knew when to stop. Essentially vindictive, he could always swallow his wrath if he found that the gratification of his passion would cost him too dear.

Pedestrian, is it not? In his earlier preface Sir James Ramsay mildly lays claim to the title of a "drum and trumpet" historian. The suggestion raises a smile. His battles do not certainly move us, as the ballad of Chevy-Chase moved Sidney, with the sound of a trumpet.

HE found his work, but far behind
Lay something that he could not find—Deep springs of passion that can make
A life sublime for others' sake,
And lend to work the living glow
That saints and bards and heroes know.
The power lay there—unfolded power—
A bud that never bloomed a flower;
For half beliefs and jaded moods
Of worldlings, critics, cynics, prudes,
Lay round his path, and dimmed and chilled
Illusions past. High hopes were killed;
But Duty lived. He sought not far
The "might be" in the things that are;
His ear caught no celestial strain;
He dreamt of no millennial reign.
Brave, true, unhoping, calm, austere,
He laboured in a narrow sphere,
And found in work his spirit needs—
The last, if not the best of creeds.

Notes on New Books.

WAR.

IN these days war books can scarcely keep pace with the wars which inspire them. Chitral and Omdurman are still in our minds, and now come two works on Cuba. The War in Cuba (Smith & Elder) is by Mr. John Black Atkins, who went out to New York, Tampa, and Cuba as correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, his duty being to supplement news rather than to convey it at first hand. A light volume in a red cover, printed in large type, and throughout interesting, Mr. Atkins's book should be read if only as a commentary on Mr. Kipling's hortatory verses, "Take up the White Man's Burden." For Mr. Atkins goes to the root of things, and gives us the spirit as well as the facts of the struggle. His book is full of human touches and by-way facts, conversations, anecdotes, and well-founded comment. Here is a story. While many of the U.S. transports were more or less under the fire of the Punta Garda batteries, and while everyone on board the Santiago had still a whole skin and a fiery heart, a poor private lay on a stretcher, prosaically dying of bronchitis:

Nothing could be done except to place him between the two doors, where the hot draught blew on him. The sound of the firing appeared to break in on his mind and harass him deeply. While we were being fired at, men ran excitedly from one side of the ship to the other to see where the shells struck, and twice, at least, someone (quite inadvertently) ran his foot against the stretcher, which stood rather in the way, and the sick man gulped. The accident was just an incident of warfare; everyone desired to be kind to this man, but all the circumstances encouraged carelessness. So he went on to his death in a black eddy, as it were, of the great stream of war, while excitement and laughter were about him.

Mr. Atkins's narrative is graphic and euthralling; quite a document.

Mr. Richard Harding Davis is a novelist with an eye for effects. He writes easily, if with no great distinction. He is active, and he takes the hail of bullets and the fall of shells as part of a war correspondent's day's work. In The Cuban and Porto Rican Campaign (Heinemann) he has run together the story of all he saw as correspondent of a New York journal during the late campaign. The result is a book for the general reader rather than for the military student. It is an enthusiastic appreciation of the American soldier, his bravery and his bounce, and a very plain-spoken depreciation of General Shafter. We do not envy the General's feelings on reading such a passage as this, although, no doubt, by this time the columns of the Press have hardened him to criticism:

On the day after the battle of San Juan, he said hopelessly to a foreign attaché: "I am prostrate in body and mind." He could confess this to a stranger, and yet, so great was the obstinacy, so great the vanity and self-confidence of the man, that, although he held the lives and health of 13,000 soldiers in his care, he did not ask to be relieved of his command. . . . His self-complacency was so great that, in spite of blunder after blunder, folly upon folly, and mistake upon mistake, he still believed himself infallible, still bullied his inferior officers, and still cursed from his cot.

In spite of gross mismanagement, unnecessary hardships, and suffering that might have been avoided, the rank and file behaved admirably; but in his endeavour to glorify the "boys" of his native land, we are inclined to smile when Mr. Davis wishes us to be most serious. For example: A youth, being badly wounded, was given over to the surgeons. The operation being over, he opened his eyes and regarded the surgeons scornfully. "Then he shook his head from side to side on the pillow and smiled up at them. 'Ah, you've can't kill me,' he whispered. 'I'm a New Yorker, by God! You've can't kill me.'" "That," remarks Mr. Davis, stopping, no doubt, to wave his pen in the air, "is the spirit of the men who sunk the Spanish fleet at Manila and at Santiago, and of the crew of the warship that is named after the city of New York." Apart from this example, and a few others scattered through the pages, of "young America's way," the book may be recommended as a bright and very readable account of the campaign as the author of Gallager saw it.

HISTORY.

The integrity of a series—viz., "Builders of Great Britain"—rather than a definite need, is met by Sir Alexander John Arbuthnot's Lord Clive (Unwin). Biographies of Clive are numerous, and Macaulay's essay, founded on Malcolm's Life, has had an immense circulation. At the same time Sir A. J. Arbuthnot's new Life has a character of its own. It does not treat Clive so badly as Caraccioli's does, nor so generously as Sir John Malcolm's biography. Sir John Arbuthnot holds, that although Clive was "doubtless at times unscrupulous, what he did he never attempted to conceal, nor was there anything in his conduct or his character to which the term 'base' could fitly be applied." Looking through these pages, we observe that the author does not throw the cold water of doubt on the story of Clive's duel with an officer whom he had accused of cheating:

Clive, having fired at, and missed, his antagonist, the latter came close up to him, and, holding his pistol to his head, desired him to ask for his life, which Clive did. His opponent then called upon him to retract his assertions regarding unfair play, and, on his refusal, threatened to shoot him. "Fire and be d—d," was Clive's reply. "I said you cheated, and I say so still, and I will never pay you."

Sir John Arbuthnot justly points out that Browning's version of this story in his dramatic idyll, "Clive," omits all mention of the officer's demand that Clive should beg for his life, and Clive's compliance. Browning also embellished the story by making the officer acknowledge his guilt under the spell of Clive's righteous anger. The frontispiece portrait of Lord Clive is from a painting at Powis Castle. Who was the painter?

The chief interest of Austria to the rest of Europe at the present day is that she is one of the Triple Alliance, and a bulwark against the westward advance of Russia. In this connexion her relations with the States of the Balkan peninsula are of the highest interest to the student of politics, and Mr. Whitman is, therefore, quite justified in adding Austria to Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Story of the Nations" series. Austria, though a strangely composite nation, has had a past of great influence on the history of Europe; and from the time when she began to represent the Holy Roman Empire, there have been few wars and disputes in which she has not borne her share—generally to her detriment—her fortune lying in the successful marriages of her ruling family. Again, Europe owes Austria a debt of gratitude for having borne the brunt of the Ottoman invasion in the Middle Ages, when the tide of conquest rolled up to the very gates of Vienna, and for having saved all but the Balkan peninsula from being overrun by the warriors of Solyman and Mahomet. The quarrels with Hungary and the neighbouring States are of but little interest to English readers, though they have gone on through the centuries to almost our own day. What is of real value, is to trace the gradual decadence of Austria as the great Central European Power, and her steady disappearance from Western European politics. The absorption of Bosnia was a great step towards the East, which even the alliance with Germany cannot overbalance. This is brought out fairly well in Mr. Whitman's book, which, however, is, it must be remembered, not a history of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, but of the German provinces so inseparably bound up with the fortunes of the Hapsburgs. The book is afflicted with a lamentable index. This series would be increased in value tenfold if it had good and sufficient indices.

THEOLOGY.

In Our Prayer Book: Conformity and Conscience (Smith, Elder) Canon Page Roberts furnishes another demonstration of the convenient elasticity of the Anglican formularies. That nothing within the boards of the Prayer Book contradicts the definitions of the Council of Trent has been freely asserted for fifty years; the Canon of Canterbury shows with humorous ingenuity that such stumbling-blocks as priestly absolution and the unkind threats of the pseudo-Athanasius need constitute no bar to religious communion with the most primitive or the most rationalistic of Puritans. So, from one side as from the other, shall the see of St. Augustine be found the rallying-point of a perplexed Christendom.

The Holy Land in Geography and in History (S. W. Partridge) is the title shared by two volumes of which the author is an American scholar, Mr. Townsend MacCoun. They are intended for the use of Sunday-school teachers, and we are driven to suppose that this class of preceptor on the other side of the Atlantic is of an extraordinarily vigorous and inquiring character. The results of the latest investigations are presented to him in a highly condensed form, illustrated by some three hundred maps, physical and political; and his knowledge of the ins and outs of Palestinian strata, and of the vicissitudes of Syrian history, should soon be an astonishment to the manes of the Twelve Apostles.

BELLS.

Other folk than campanologists will find much that is interesting in The Church Bells of Huntingdonshire, by the Rev. T. M. N. Owen, M.A. (Jarrold). The book contains 149 quarto pages, which are kept in a kind of wakefulness by numerous woodcuts, Gothic letterings, churchwardens' accounts, &c. Mr. Owen is the rector of a Huntingdonshire village, and we imagine that the six years which he has spent in putting this book together have brought him the consolations, as well as the burdens, of his task. In his Preface, Mr. Owen drops a remark which enables us to picture him as one of two clergymen in a dog-cart, bowling serenely along between the hedges fragrant with dog-rose; their talk being of "ancients," and the tenor of Hamerton—"a good bell"—and the Ellacombe chiming apparatus, and the iniquity of clapper-tying, until the hedges open and the church tower of Stukeley Parva, or Pidley-cum-Fenton, appearing in sight, turns their thoughts to the immediate joys of research among the rafters and jackdaws. The most interesting part of Mr. Owen's book is that in which he discusses the quaint "Local Uses" to which church bells are put in the county. The Death Knell in Huntingdonshire is usually 3×3 for a man, 3×2 for a woman, and very often 3×1 for a child. In Dorsetshire these informing strokes come at the end or tail of the ordinary tolling: hence the saying, "Nine tailors (tailers) make a man." The "uses" of bell-ringing in Huntingdonshire are many and curious. In no fewer than twenty-one villages one or more bells are sounded after morning service (as well as before) on Sunday. It is not suspected by the yokels that these peals are survivals of the Sanctus peal in the Mass, but such is probably the fact. One Sanctus Bell survives at Great Staughton, unused and unroped. The county contains forty-eight pre-Reformation bells. At Brampton there is a "Priest Bell," which is rung only at fires, its tone being shrill, and it is locally known as "The Old R C. Priests' Bell." There are but two instances of the curfew left in Huntingdonshire; but the Pancake Bell (on Shrove Tuesday) and the Gleaning Bell (during harvest) are heard in a good many villages. We do but indicate the scope and atmosphere of a book which is an important contribution to campanology.

TRAVEL.

Dr. Nansen's Farthest North is now supplemented by the story of his right-hand man, Lieut. Hjalmar Johansen, who was Nansen's sole companion in his long sledge journey across the ice in search of the North Pole. Lieut. Johansen's story does not add much to the information we derived from Nansen's far bulkier work; nevertheless With Nansen in the North (Ward, Lock) is not the less acceptable. As translated by Mr. H. L. Brækstad, it is an easy-running narrative, simple and vivid in every line. Nothing in the book is more suggestive than its ending, which, if not new to those who have read Nansen's book, bears repeating. One day the two bearded, grimy, blubber-fed travellers were startled to hear the barking of dogs, indicating the presence of man. Nansen went off to investigate, while Johansen's shirt waved heavily on a pole. Suddenly Johansen saw a solitary figure, like a dot on the eternal snows. It approached and revealed itself as a man; he wore decent clothes and his face was washed. This was Mr. Child, of the Jackson-Harmsworth expedition. He was followed by Mr. Burgess and Mr. Fisher, the botanist; and then came wandering by—lots of people, including Mr. Jackson. There was a débauché of solitude. A "well-spread table," hot water, tablecloths, chairs, and soap were provided; and if the travellers retained a doubt that they had reached the abodes of civilisation it was dispelled when the Jackson-Harmsworth musical-box began to tinkle in the Arctic night.

Mr. E. C. Oppenheim is a member of the Alpine Club, and in the summer of 1897 he lusted to climb untrodden peaks in Norway. To make sure that he should climb none but the untrodden, Mr. Oppenheim applied to Mr. Slingsby, the best authority on Norwegian climbing, who suggested several districts, including the one our author selected—the Sondmore. Hence New Climbs in Norway (Unwin), a book of some 250 pages, full of interest to mountaineers.

VERSE.

A little while ago a contributor to the ACADEMY uttered a plea for a satirist. To some extent that plea is now answered. In Parson Dash, by Erasmus Holiday (Redway), we have a dexterous and good-humoured Hudibrastic satire against Ritualism. Parson Dash begins at Turniptop in the homely way of his fathers: he passes onward through various phases to something very nigh Rome. The contrast between the new parson and the old is marked in the soliloquy of one of Dash's late parishioners, who, visiting London, attends one of his services:

Turn ash to oak, and oak to ash,
If this be our parental Dash,
Our rector, the beloved of old,
Who safely shepherded the fold,
Shared all our merry games and sports,
The jocund friend ne'er out of sorts,
With open heart and ready hand
Cheering the pilgrim in the land.

And so forth. The various raps at ritualism, as the author calls them—

Spoil not the neat wax chandler's trade—

we shall not quote here. It is too dangerous in these days of Kensitism and anti-Kensitism: the ACADEMY'S space must be preserved for other things; but we can recommend readers to this witty and amusing book on the subject.

This generation of children know little of Mrs. Sewell's stories in verse, but in the forties, and fifties, and sixties they were in most nurseries. Hence there must be many of those children, now parents, who will be glad to have the complete edition of Mrs. Sewell's Poems and Ballads, which Messrs. Jarrold have just issued, in order that the impressions that they received from them may be transmitted again. Mrs. Sewell, whose best known work is probably "Mother's Last Words," had an easy rhyming method, and a considerable power of appealing to simple hearts. She wrote what practically were versified tracts. In her children's pieces she followed on the lines laid down by the Taylors, but with less humour and dramatic force. She was certain, however, of an audience wherever her stories were read aloud. To this complete edition of her writings is prefixed a memoir by Miss E. Boyd Bayly.

Wordsworth, in his great ode, imagined heaven lying about us in our infancy, the reflection of its glory still on the face of babes. Mr. Horace Eaton Walker, an American, in his Intimations of Heaven (Putnam: Claremont, N.H.), imagines foretastes of heaven in whatever beautiful things of earth most please us. His argument is contained in many complicated stanzas. The poem gains additional interest by being a commentary on the present times. Herr Anton Seidl's death is mentioned more than once, and the name of McKinley occurs. Here is a specimen:

The Queen of England! Here is earthly glory;
The Tsar of Russia! Here is earth renown;
Our President may wear Imperial crown
And still lose Heaven! Our Gladstone, old and hoary,
Is crowned by Love! But Corsicans are gory
In butchered blood! And hostile cannon drown
The cry of Pity! Some are great in town;
A Stevenson is great in tranced story.

In another poem, "Aidenn," Mr. Eaton mentions his favourite authors:

Taine, Lamb, Montaigne, and Zangwill,
Yea, glorious are to me
The friends I love, the friendships
Best for their rarity.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Year Book of Treatment (Cassell) has reached its fifteenth annual issue. A new feature in the present volume is an article on the Open-air Treatment of Phthisis, by Dr. Burton-Fanning, who has had practical experience of the method at Cromer.

To Messrs. Bell's "Cathedral Series" are added volumes dealing with Beverley Minster, by Charles Heath, and York Cathedral, by A. Clutton-Brock. The York volume is very well illustrated with photographs, but the Beverley photographs leave a good deal to be desired in the matter of clearness. The series is an admirable one.

We have also received a new edition of Muirhead's Historical Introduction to the Private Law of Rome, revised and edited by Henry Goudy, LL.D. (Black); Mr. H. A. Jones's play, "The Physician," in the edition of his works which Messrs. Macmillan are producing; and The Year's Music, 1899 (Virtue), edited by Mr. A. C. R. Carter, with portraits of fifteen eminent composers and conductors, and useful information for musicians, professional and amateur.

Fiction.

Gösta Berling's Saga. By Selma Lagerlöf. Translated from the Swedish by Lily Tudeer. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

THIS is a novel of a totally new kind. Saga is perhaps the best name for it, although it is in some parts as emphatically not a saga, as we understand the word, as in others it is. Imagine a sentimentalist and hero-worshipper brought up in a Scandinavian wild rich in legend and stories of the great men and lovely women of a past generation, and then imagine him, many years after, reconstructing the old society of which in his impressionable infancy and boyhood he had heard so much from nurses and elders. Then you have some notion of the book before us. It is, however, more than that, for not only is the author a sentimentalist and hero-worshipper, he is poet, too, and romanticist, and he is filled with sympathy and compassion for the weak no less than with joy in revelry and courage.

So much for what he has. What our author has not is sense of form and reticence. He has given his saga with both hands; flung incidents and reflections on the paper with the slightest thread to join them; leaped recklessly, now forward, now backward, into time; explained some things, forgotten others. But the book lives none the less. It is shapeless, bewildering, inconstant, and all the time it is alive, passionate, vigorous, picturesque, and absolutely foreign to English methods of thought. We return to the word saga with some relief: that is certainly the best description.

Gösta Berling is a young priest who has been deprived of his sacred office on account of his drunkenness. He becomes a beggar, the lowest of the low, and is seeking death in a snowdrift when the Major's wife of Ekeby drags him forth and reasons him back to life. Thenceforward Gösta Berling is one of the Ekeby cavaliers, and for the rest of the book he is brilliant and handsome and masterful, at once the strongest and weakest of men. How he crosses the lives of others, and, through suffering, finds himself and justifies the core of good that is in him—that is the story. But never was plot unfolded with more doublings and divergencies, never was allegory (if it is allegory) so bravely tricked out in the garments of romance. One passage can give no notion of so varied a book; yet here is part of the conversation between the Major's wife (the most striking figure in the story) and Gösta Berling:

But suddenly the Major's wife was silent—and took two or three turns about the room. Then she drew up a chair to the fire, placed her feet on the hearth, and rested her elbows on her knees.

"Good God," she said, half laughing to herself, "what I said was so true, I didn't notice it myself. Don't you think, Gösta Berling, that most people in the world are dead or half dead? Do you think we are all alive? Ah no! Look at me. I am the Lady of the Manor at Ekeby and the most powerful woman in Värmland. If I lift a finger, the county police must skip; if I lift two, the bishop does the same; and if I lift three, I can make the Archbishop and Council and all the judges and land proprietors in Värmland dance polka on Karlstad market-place. And yet I tell you, boy, I am nothing but a dressed-up corpse. God alone knows how little life there is in me!"

The beggar leaned forward in his chair and listened anxiously. The old lady rocked herself before the fire, and never glanced at him as she spoke.

"Don't you think," she continued, "that if I were a living soul and saw you sitting there, miserable and sad, with thoughts of suicide in your mind, that I could dispel them in a breath? I should have tears and prayers to move you, and I would save you—but now—I am dead. God knows how little life there is in me!"

For the later life of the Major's wife, for the cavaliers (who were of the tribe of the Three Musketeers) and their escapades, and for Gösta Berling's history, the reader must go to this remarkable book himself. He will find himself in a new world. It is too long, it is often tantalising, and it is not too well translated; but Gösta Berling's Saga is very well worth reading.

A Prince from the Great Never Never. By Mary F. A. Tench. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE heroine of this novel, Molly Despard, came back to the parental Irish home, after serving as companion in India, and found the various members of her family sorely abraded, as to their tempers, by the continual grind of poverty. It had not always been so with the Despards, as appears from the entertaining gossip of an ancient peasant crone, who talks through whole pages without a break.

Perhaps it was the remembrance of a past magnificence which intensified the acidity of the Despard household.

The technique of the tale is crude, sometimes painfully so. Molly is much too angelic; her sister much too Satanic. The action is continually forced; in particular, the advent of Mollie's Prince is managed with a maximum of clumsiness. Further, the style leaves something to be desired. Slang phrases such as "negotiate," in reference to a distance, abound. But the book has merit, promise, and some performance. The sketches of Irish character are often very good indeed, and the whole story is informed by a pleasing vivacity of movement.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

BY BERWEN'S BANKS.

BY ALLEN RAINE.

A new novel by the author of A Welsh Singer. This also is Welsh. Gwynne Ellis and Caradoc Wynne—these are the principal men, and Valmai (which means "like May") is the heroine. Incidentally, we meet with Belto and Shoui, Deio and Essec Powell, Gwladys and Shou Gweydd. The story is of love and sadness. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

LOVE AND OLIVIA.

BY MARGARET B. CROSS.

Olivia was Miss Olivia Wynworth, blue-stocking and very charming girl. This little comedy-novel opens with the concluding words of one of Olivia's lectures, and concludes with her betrothal to Leslie Joliffe and abandonment of her great work on Persephone. On the way she was engaged to George Gorst, but it seemed well to disregard the promise. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

OMAR THE TENT MAKER.

BY NATHAN HASKELL DOLE.

Mr. Dole has edited the "Multiform Edition" of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, and we suppose that it is in a sort of intellectual reaction from the nice balancing of texts that he now puts on the spectacles of a novelist and gives us this "romance of old Persia," with Omar for its hero. We note that Omar's career is followed up to his death. Someone has said that nothing has less novelty than death, and we read that the report of Omar's demise was "received with sorrow by a wide circle." (Duckworth & Co. 6s.)

THE MANDARIN.

BY CARLTON DAWE.

The mandarin was Wang, a Chinese villain of the utmost turpitude, and the story tells how he and his myrmidons tried to gain possession of an English girl named Rose, and how the first-person-singular of the book prevented them. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

JOHN BEDE'S WIFE.

BY CECIL WENTWORTH.

Accurately speaking, John Bede had two wives. One was Kate, whom he married when he was drunk and she was suffering from loss of memory. Hence neither knew anything about it. Subsequently he married Bessy. Then Bessy died, and John and Kate, in the last chapter, are again, and consciously, united. The book has New Zealand for background. (Digby & Long. 6s.)

BROWN, V.C.

BY "MRS. ALEXANDER."

We do not know whether this is the Mrs. Alexander of The Wooing Ot, or another. The quotation marks suggest that the name is a pseudonym. The story begins with the arrival of Mrs. Brown at a lodging-house, the birth of a man child, and the mysterious departure of the mother. The boy is brought up by the lodging-house keeper, assisted by a doctor. He enters the army, wins his V.C., and on p. 349 learns that he is Viscount Hazelhurst of Caresford Court and Baronston. There is also love interest. (Unwin. 6s.)

LADY LANARK'S PAYING GUEST.

BY GERTRUDE FORD.

A flippant tale of society and its fringe. The paying guest is Miranda Higg, an American, and Lady Lanark's son loves her from the first, but is kept waiting until the end, while a variety of complications are being unravelled and removed. There is also a profane peer. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

A GIRL OF THE KLONDIKE.

BY VICTORIA CROSS.

A novel by the author of The Woman Who Didn't. The story contains plenty of climate, gold dust, and gore. "Like a flash Katrine interposed between them, and Jim's bullet found a lodgment in her lungs. She had fired also. The shots had been simultaneous, and the miner fell, without a groan, without a murmur, forward across the table, carrying it with him to the floor. The gold pile scattered amongst the filthy sawdust on the ground." Katrine "sank backwards into Talbot's arms, and her head fell to his shoulder like that of a tired child falling asleep." (Walter Scott. 3s. 6d.)

THE BLACK CURTAIN.

By FLORA HAINES LONGHEAD.

There is a great find of gold: "Robert Judith was a good enough arithmetician to be able to calculate an approximate measurement of the red hill. He realised that, if a few spoonfuls . . . could yield half a thimbleful of gold, there was untold wealth in the entire hill, with its thousands upon thousands of tons." This story is laid in California and is full of local colour. The Black Curtain mystery is pleasantly raised and solved, and the rest is courtship and marriage. (Duckworth & Co. 6s.)

R. L. Stevenson Again.

I.—As Letter Writer.

WE all have friends among the dead of whom we can say, to read them is to be touched to an emotion that is as indefinable as it is delightful. Robert Louis Stevenson has that effect upon me. Open him where I will the thrill never fails. Gaiety is tethered to his pages. They gleam with sunlight. Moorland winds blow through them. I give him five minutes, the walls of the room fall apart, and my imagination is skipping to his mood. The turn of his sentences is so unexpected, the style so magical, and often—often, where we would have been content with the second best, the right word, the only word, darts to the eyes. Ill-health he had and many troubles, yet how radiant he remained, how light-footed even in graver moments. I think of him as some Oberon eternally young, running here, roaming there, seeking the bright eyes of adventure. He trips on tip-toe across the panorama of our time, interested in everything, obsessed by nothing, never swerving from the dominating passion of his life—to express, in the best possible way, the fancies and images that chased through his brain. The gift of expression was his from the beginning. "Heroic industry," no doubt, made it articulate, but there it was even at the age of twenty-three, when the earliest of the letters printed in the February number of Scribner's Magazine, from which I quote below, date. These letters, Mr. Colvin tells us in a prefatory note, were written between the years 1873 to 1875—all before he was twenty-five. They were addressed to a lady in London, a relative of one of his Balfour cousins. Apart from their charm these letters are interesting as showing how keen was his observation, how wide his sympathies, even in those early days. Thus he writes to his correspondent:

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I feel so happy all over when I think that you remember me kindly. Life is doubled for me. I have been up to-night lecturing to a friend on life and duties, and what a man could do; a coal off the altar had been laid on my lips, and I talked quite above my average, and I hope I spread, what you would wish to see spread, into one person's heart; and with a new light upon it.

And again:

It is a thing to thank God for that there should be someone like you, carrying so bright a lamp of comfort up and down our dim life, bringing priceless sympathy to one and to another, giving it, widely and fearlessly, like the good sun.

At twenty-three many budding writers are romantic, and many hug sorrow, but few touch the note so gently, yet so firmly, as Stevenson does in this passage:

To-night, as I was walking along Princes-street, I heard the bugles sound the recall. I do not think I had ever remarked it before; there is something of unspeakable appeal in the cadence. I felt as if something yearningly cried to me out of the darkness overhead, to come thither and find rest; one felt as if there must be warm hearts and bright fires waiting for one up there, where the buglers stood on the damp pavement and sounded their friendly invitation forth into the night.

Nature was already his friend:

I got a quiet seat behind a yew hedge and went away into a meditation. I was very happy after my own fashion, and whenever there came a blink of sunshine, or a bird whistled a bit higher than usual, or a little powder of white apple blossom came over the hedge and settled slowly about me in the grass, I had the happiest little flutter at my heart, and stretched myself for very voluptuousness.

But Nature could be cruel too:

O how I hate a storm at night! They have been a great influence in my life, I am sure; for I can remember them so far back—long before I was six at least, for we left the house in which I remember listening to them times without number when I was six. And in those days the storm had for me a perfect impersonation, as durable and unvarying as any heathen deity. I always heard it, as a horseman riding past with his cloak about his head, and somehow always carried away, and riding past again, and being baffled yet once more, ad infinitum, all night long. I think I wanted him to get past, but I am not sure; I know only that I had some interest either for or against in the matter, and I used to lie and hold my breath, not quite frightened, but in a state of miserable exaltation.

The finger of ill-health was already pressing upon him: "I must be very strong to have all this vexation and still be well. I was weighed the other day, and the gross weight of my large person was eight-stone six! Does it not seem surprising that I can keep the lamp alight through all this gusty weather in so frail a lantern? And yet it burns cheerily." So curious about life, nothing human was alien to his sympathy. The slightest things touched his imagination: "In the streets I saw two men meet, after a long separation it was plain. They came forward with a little run and leaped at each other's hands. You never saw such bright eyes as they both had."

Finally, here is part of a longish passage inspired by the Elgin marble group of the Three Fates, of which a friend had given him a photograph:

I think of these three deep-breasted women, living out all their days on remote hill-tops, seeing the white dawn and the purple even, and the world outspread before them forever, and no more to them forever than a sight of the eyes, a hearing of the ears, a far-away interest of the inflexible heart, not pausing, not pitying, but austere with a holy austerity, rigid with a calm and passionless rigidity; and I find them none the less women to the end. I look over my shoulder at the three great headless Madonnas, and they look back at me and do not move; see me, and through and over me, the foul life of the city, dying to its embers already as the night draws on; and over miles and miles of silent country, set here and there with lit towns, thundered through here and there with night expresses scattering fire and smoke; and away to you, and they see you; and away to the ends of the earth, and the furthest star, and the blank regions of nothing; and they are not moved. My quiet, great-kneed, deep-breasted, well-draped ladies of Necessity, I give my heart to you!

Something, is it not, to be able to write like this at twenty-four?

Things Seen.

Points of View.

Two passengers awaited the train on the open country platform.

The poet from town looked across to where a flapping line of damp clothes stretched out from the backs of a jerry-built row of brick cottages.

His glance wandered down the gravelled platform, taking in the gaudy mud-bespattered advertisements, and the fowls clucking dismally as they strayed among the flowerless beds. He shuddered.

He looked towards his fellow-passenger—a little, bent man, in a suit the original colour of which was vaguely reminiscent, whose leather-stained thumbs denoted his occupation, and who carried under one arm a bulky parcel done up in newspaper.

The poet looked away. It was even less inspiring than the limp clothes-line.

The little man came nearer, shifting his parcel to the other arm.

"Wonderful weather fur the time o' year, sir."

The poet flung back his fur-lined coat.

"Beastly mild!" he assented.

A look, that in other eyes might have seemed tender, crept into the weak, bleared ones of the little shoemaker.

"Ay, to be sure! Wonderful mild fur December, sir. Thrush in the park as I come by just now, singing as sweet as if 'twas May."

Invisibility.

"FARES, please!" said the conductor as he clambered up the stairs and the 'bus swung round into the Fulham-road.

I was sitting on the near seat behind, and the two policemen on the seat before me bulged over the gangway, and left a space through which the conductor could scarcely squeeze.

"All right," said the outside policeman to his companion, as he heeled over and searched into a remote pocket.

From the forward part of the 'bus came the ting of the conductor's punch. The policeman was holding out something in his hand, talking meantime to his colleague. But the conductor pushed by, unnoticing, took my fare, gave me my ticket, and proceeded to descend the staircase.

I turned in my seat, and finding his face on a level with my own, I said:

"Two more fares to pay." The policeman was still holding out his hand with something in it.

"I can't see coppers," said the conductor, as his face disappeared. The driver's whip sounded on the side window.

"'Least, some kird! Walham Green, Putney," he added from the footboard.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

ON last Thursday the prize Jean Reynaud was awarded to M. Legouvé, the octogenarian Academician. This is one of the most important of the prizes, amounting to the acceptable sum of £400. Each of the five Academies takes it in turn to award it for the work of the highest originality and importance published during the year on the special branches of art, literature, or science within the scope of academic jurisdiction. M. Legouvé opened the discussion with a flamboyant eulogy of that extremely flamboyant masterpiece, Cyrano de Bergerac, which he proposed as worthy of the prize. The thirty-nine Immortals naturally hesitated. Whatever the too famous and too popular Cyrano may be, it cannot accurately be described as a work of literature, science, or art of "the highest originality or importance." The multitudes of the earth, of, I believe, all lands and continents, led by the infallible judgment of the illustrious M. Sarcy (not certainly the voice of the exclusive minority), have loudly acclaimed this gasconade, but, as it was to be expected, the palm-embroidered fogies who occupy the arm-chairs under Richelieu's dome declined to march by the triumphant swing of the "Cadets de Gascogne," and crown the incomparable genius of the youthful M. Rostand. The world has done that already. The Academy preferred to crown the not particularly original or important, but highly respectable, long labours of M. Legouvé. May we all be crowned at the age of eighty, if we have the misfortune to live and labour so long either in the interests of art, literature, science, or mere humanity. Nobody can begrudge M. Legouvé his prize, which gave him great pleasure, and is the reward of industry if not of genius. But was that amiable little comedy of Thursday indispensable? Was the Academy award altogether the surprise to M. Legouvé he feigned it to be?

Another remarkable award was the prize given to M. Henri de Regnier, a poet whose chief claim to respectful attention lies in the fact that he has married a distinguished poet, the daughter of the impeccable sonneteer, M. de Heredia. So befathered, so wived, one may face the world of letters imperturbably. The prize may be described as one of co-lateral merit. It was, in reality, given to his wife, who has just published anonymously in the Revue des Deux Mondes a most beautiful poem—"Rencontre avec Persephone." Anonymous work cannot, even by an Academy, be crowned, so M. de Regnier gallantly wears his wife's laurels.

M. Charles Legros, a contributor to the Débats, lately visited the Green Isle, and has recorded his tourist's impressions in a sympathetic volume, Terre d'Irlande. It is conspicuously deficient in the hasty and absurd generalisations and judgments that made the reading of such a book as Chez Paddy an exasperation. M. Legros is an intelligent and fair-minded traveller, and produces the views of the landlord and of Mr. William O'Brien with impartial accuracy. Personally, I should have preferred a little less politics, and more of scenery, incident, and travellers' impressions. He pays tribute to the beauty and mournfulness of Irish landscape, but his pen has not seized it for our captivation. In this has M. Bourget alone succeeded in that delicate, wistful, and lovely little masterpiece, Neptunevale. Here, in a few exquisite pages, has he compressed all the quaintness, the sadness, the tenderness, the unfathomable depths of romance, faith, superstition, terror, and devotion of the most inconsistent of national characters, the most changeful, attractive, and inexplicable of lands. The best book on Ireland has yet to be written. I doubt if it could be written by an Irishman, and am certain no Englishman could write it. The ideal author will be either a sympathetic Scotchman, with something of Stevenson's temperament, or a Catholic Frenchman, with some of the intellectual loftiness and liberality of a Montalembert. The former would write a charming, the latter a great, book on so varied, so elusive, so curious a theme.

I hear, on excellent authority, that M. Anatole France's forthcoming book will be one of the best he has yet produced. We are promised, in The Anneau d'Améthyste, something even better than that most delightful Orme du Mail. I will be indiscreet, and announce beforehand that one of the best figures in the book is a portrait of the illustrious, the noble Esterhazy, the "cher commandant" who for so long represented with credit and renown the honour of the French Army.

Mme. Jean Bertheroy's last novel, which ran through the Revue de Paris, was an erudite and voluptuous revival of the paganism of the Sicilian Idyllists. The book was a brilliant tour de force; and here is another of a like quaint and erudite fancy: Amour Etrusque, a pretty, illustrated volume published under a pseudonym in the "Collection Nymphée." It is of a slenderer and more delicate quality than Mme. Bertheroy's flowery wanderings in the land of pagan sensuality; easier reading too, in its quiet style, and gives one the idea that the Etruscans might even have been such as they are here fancifully depicted. Why not, after all? And it is better entertainment to spend an evening hour over this pretty and inoffensive caprice of erudition than wander backwards to the unctuous infamy of M. Pierre Louys' Aphrodite. But can such meaningless tours de force be said ever to repay reader or author for all the care and labour and thought they involve? What can Etruscan loves be to us, since neither we nor the writer know anything about them?

Memoirs of the Moment.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS has met with a nasty accident, and the only good thing that can be said about it is that its consequences might have been much worse than they now are—a severe shaking and a broken leg. Mr. Phillips, who lives a short distance from town, reached a London station the other day, and alighted without noticing that the train had not already stopped. The result was a very nasty fall; and when Mr. Phillips was carried to the nearest hospital he was found to be suffering from the injuries we have already named. His progress, we are happy to be able to add, has been as satisfactory as could be expected.

SIR HUBERT JERNINGHAM has decided to retire from the Governorship of Trinidad. Sir Hubert gives up a salary of £5,000 a year. The retiring Governor has some of that all-round quality which belonged to the Elizabethans—the quality of a dilettante and of a man of affairs combined. Before he took to governing he sat in Parliament and he wrote a novel. Nor is it unlikely that the first drafts of his official despatches, if scrutinised, would betray on the other side of the sheets some scribbled verses which many versifiers less modest than Sir Hubert would proceed to publish.

To Lord Leighton, as was narrated last week, the late Mr. Harry Bates, A.R.A., owed the privilege of placing his statue of Lord Roberts in the courtyard at Burlington House. When Lord Leighton died the young sculptor designed a memorial figure—that of an angel apparelled in gold, crowned with laurel, bearing in one hand a palm and in the other a wreath of violets. A replica of this, made by Mr. Harry Bates's assistants, was carried to his own grave in Stevenage the other day—a quiet churchyard in the Hertfordshire village that belongs to the Lyttons. Among the mourners who stood around were Mr. Shannon, Mr. Frampton, and their new Associate, Mr. Goscombe John. Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Onslow Ford sent wreaths, and among the letters of condolence received by the widow was one from Lord Roberts.

LORD ROWTON is going to Egypt, and, seated by the Sphinx, he may be able to solve the problem raised by the publication of his old Chief's letter to Peel. Meanwhile, there are one or two observations which even an outsider may offer as to the comments made on that letter in some quarters. It has brought forth a whole crop of assumptions—that Disraeli, having meanly and mercenarily applied for office, was snubbed by Peel; that Disraeli denied having made an application, whereupon Peel, though it was bulging out his coat-pocket, magnanimously held his hand and tongue; and finally, that Disraeli felt vindictive revenge, which took shape in a factious opposition to his former leader, expressed in discourteous terms. To accentuate the situation, "The Character of Disraeli" is the heading given in one quarter to the correspondence and the comments on it; and elsewhere it is opined that nobody, after this, will have the hardihood to say a good word for the dead Minister. That was a sort of treatment often meted out to him in life; but lately one thought that, at any rate in England, the honour of a public man after his death became a sort of national possession, which all his countrymen desire to defend.

FIRST of all let there be an end of cant about the application for "recognition," which may be allowed to mean a post in the administration that Peel was then, in 1841, forming. There is nothing unusual, still less disgraceful, in such an application. Peel's letter in reply proves that the claims made upon him were many; and the other Peel Papers show Lord Stanley applying for a peerage before his father's death, Gladstone asking to be sent on a mission, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe demanding higher posts, and so on, and so on. Peel himself, when offered a minor post, had once refused to join a Government with which he differed, but had waived that difference on being given a higher one. In this offer of service, then, there is no breach of honour or etiquette; indeed, a man's belief in his own fitness for the post is often—and rightly—an important factor in his appointment. Nor was there anything "chilling" or reproving in the Minister's reply—his "My dear Sir" in response to Disraeli's "gushing" "Dear Sir Robert" being his usual, and rather official, method of addressing letters, before and after this particular one, to the correspondent who also used on all other occasions the "Dear Sir Robert" form. It must be added to Sir Robert's credit, that, though he had not the wit to "discover" Disraeli as a man to promote, he had, up to that date, showed him abundant personal kindnesses, such as turning round to cheer him in the House and paying him attention in society. All the same, the two men were totally divergent in temperament and in policy. Both knew it. But those who speak of Disraeli as turning round to attack Peel because Peel did not give him office forget two things. They ignore the fact that Peel parted from Disraeli on Protection, not Disraeli from Peel; and that in such matters as the reform of the Factory Acts Disraeli the Younger, and all Young England, had long before declared their hatred for the methods and means of "the Manchester School." Their great fellow reformer, Lord Shaftesbury, then in the Commons as Lord Ashley, was writing to Peel at this time about the Game Laws, saying that he must, in the absence of any move on Peel's part, enlist under the banner of Mr. Bright, although, as he confesses to Peel, "I have no satisfaction in following a person who is almost unfitted by his manners for educated society, and of whom I never heard it proved that he was either honest or humane." That was the language of the great philanthropist. There is nothing to match it in any words spoken by Disraeli on Peel; and the time has really arrived when the outworn vocabulary applied to Disraeli's "attacks," to his "venom," and so forth, might be allowed to become obsolete.

ALL this said, the fact abides that Disraeli asked office from Peel, and, when twitted with having done so a few years later by Peel, openly denied it. That is the only odd thing in the matter. There are three possible explanations: that he was "bluffing"; that he had forgotten the letter; or that, remembering it, he did not mean "office" by "recognition." The first supposition seems out of the question. Apart from his personal honour, his mere interest in his career would prevent him, in face of a charge not in itself, as has been shown, discreditable to him, from giving the lie to Peel, which Peel could hurl back in his face with documentary disproof. Could such be the "tactics" of a Macchiavelli? The idea seems to be preposterous; and the public would particularly like to hear the preference of Lord Rowton among the remaining alternatives.

MR. CHRISTOPHER REDINGTON, whose rather sudden death is announced from Ireland, was a man of whom the world might easily have hoped to hear more. The son of Sir Thomas Redington, Under-Secretary for Ireland, he was born in Dublin in 1847, the year of famine. At Christ Church, Oxford, he graduated with distinction, carrying off a "Double First," and he was President of the Union. Returning to his Galway home, he served as High Sheriff for his county, devoted himself to the interests of his tenants, and turned them into proprietors whenever there was an opportunity. He fought shy, as best he could, of the common fray of politics; but he accepted a seat, in 1893, on the Special Commission appointed by Mr. Morley, and presided over by Sir James Mathew, for considering the position of evicted tenants. Later he was made a Privy Councillor, and he accepted the post of Resident Commissioner of National Education, working at it with unwearied assiduity to the very end. Last Christmas Day he spent in England with Lord Crewe, and he complained of feeling unwell; but he curtailed his holiday on hearing from one of his staff, and, returning, encountered one of the worst crossings ever known. He suffered a good deal on his arrival in Dublin, but he spent the first day, a Sunday, at his office. A breakdown of his apparently powerful frame followed. He was removed to Killiney, and there he has passed away.

LONDON is given over for the moment to Rembrandt. It is not merely that he holds Burlington House, that the National Gallery has opened its doors to two more of his masterpieces, and that the British Museum is about to make an exhibition of his etchings. The shopkeeper has started his own show, and the man in the street, who does not go inside galleries, is caught by reproductions of faces painted more than two hundred years ago in Amsterdam, which now reign from the windows of the printsellers and even the second-hand bookshops of London. Dutch cannon were heard in the Thames while Rembrandt lived. London resented the ugly sound; but she is either passive or delighted to-day in the fact of this particular Dutchman's undisputed occupation of her marts and halls.

SHE can flourish staff or pen,
And deal a wound that lingers;
She can talk the talk of men,
And touch with thrilling fingers.

From George Meredith's "Marian."

Drama.

Mr. H. V. Esmond's Play.

THE New Century Theatre is rapidly justifying its existence. Among other things, it introduced last year to the stage "Admiral Guinea"; and this season it has opened its campaign with a play that may with justice be assigned a high position in dramatic literature. During his short, but singularly interesting, career as a writer Mr. H. V. Esmond has revealed a curious tendency towards inequality. In "The Divided Way" and "One Summer's Day" he gave us work of the most promising kind; in "Cupboard Love" he proved how easy it is for a dramatist to misjudge his own powers. His latest piece, "Grierson's Way," produced on Tuesday afternoon at the Haymarket, settles once for all, however, his title to rank among the living forces of the English drama. Admittedly it is not a play that will appeal to the taste of everyone. By the general public it will probably be relished hardly more keenly than the proverbial caviare—for its note is painful, its trend gloomy and sombre; but it reveals in the young playwright an insight into character, an emotional quality, a power of bringing into swift and vivid prominence the deeper feelings of human nature, quite remarkable. In the conduct of the theme selected by the author, in the tragic dénouement by which the story is rounded off, may be found abundant matter for discussion; with ample reason it may be objected that both are to some extent of an arbitrary and despotic nature. A woman betrayed by one man marries another, many years her senior, in order that her own and her still unborn child's shame may be given the protection of a putative paternity. The device works badly. The old lover returns to exercise his former influence over the girl, an influence now emphasised by the right of fatherhood. "If there are three, one must die," was the moral deduced from the same or a nearly similar situation by the authors of "The Jest." It is not, however, in Mr. Esmond's play to any of the three principal characters concerned that the working out of the problem to its tragic conclusion is entrusted. Over all hovers a fateful presence in the form of a misshapen, half-crazy, drink-disordered musician, who, loving the woman himself after his strange, fantastic fashion, recognises that only in her husband's death lies her own safety. In the end Grierson also is led to accept this view, and the madman's triumph is complete. That his satisfaction will be universally shared is a point open to doubt. But granting that the author's teaching leaves something to be desired on ethical and even on rational grounds, it is impossible to blind oneself to the wonderful ability, resource, and skill exhibited in the play, the entire action of which is confined to one small room and carried on practically by five characters. With such an achievement to his credit Mr. Esmond's future must necessarily be a question of the profoundest concern to all interested in the welfare of the drama. Nor would it be easy to speak in terms too extravagant of the performance. In the part of Pamela, Miss Lena Ashwell was afforded an opportunity of which she made the best and most gratifying use. That she has still to correct faults of manner, diction, and even perception, may be granted, but that she has within her the stuff of which notable actresses are made is indubitable. Mr. Esmond's study of the ill-balanced musician was remarkable in many ways, while Mr. George S. Titheradge, Mr. J. H. Barnes, Mr. Fred. Terry, and Miss Pattie Bell combined to make up a cast of exceptional excellence.

Correspondence

"Green's Short History of the English People."

SIR,—Lately looking over the above work, I lighted upon a passage which arrested my attention. It is to be found in Chapter VIII. (Puritan England): "When Cromwell saw the mists break over the hills of Dunbar, he hailed the sunburst with the cry of David: 'Let God arise and let His enemies be scattered, like as the sun riseth so shalt Thou drive them away.'"

Is there, sir, any authority for this deviation from the usual text as found in the Book of Psalms in our Prayer Book, or as it is rendered in the Old Testament version: "As smoke is driven away so drive them away"? Perhaps some one of your many readers can inform me?—I am, &c.,

Books on Approval.

SIR,—We have read your paragraph in this week's issue referring to our offering to send our "Bibelots" on approval. This is a new departure for us, but was adopted owing to some booksellers in London and the country declining to stock them on account of their smallness. Up to the present about twelve copies have been sent out on approval, and in each case the book has been kept, complimentary remarks with a remittance following immediately. We are not sure that we should take a similar risk with a more expensive book. In the United States the system there is for the money to accompany the order, and if the book is not approved of the money is returned in full. We think that this system deserves attention on this side.—We are, &c.,

"Umbra Coeli."

SIR,—An author ought to face the verdict of a jury of critics. Your vote is cast con. Perhaps you are right Nemo fuit iudex in proposita causâ, least of all a versewriter. But, pardon, when you quote, would it not be just to give my text, instead of your own courteous emendation? I, mea maxima culpa! wrote:

I own no separate soul;

you have rendered the line:

I am no separate soul.

So I am hanged on false evidence!—I am, &c.,

COMPTON READE.

Macaulay and Edgar Allan Poe.

SIR,—Your correspondent has not given the date of the first publication of Poe's Tale of the Ragged Mountains. The life of Poe in Mr. W. M. Rossetti's volume of American Poems gives 1841 as the date of Poe's first volume of stories: Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque. Whether this included the tale in question I do not know; but it could not, at all events, have been earlier than this.

Now, Macaulay's Essay on Warren Hastings appeared in the Edinburgh Review, October, 1841. If Macaulay had read Poe's tale he must have become acquainted with an obscure volume printed in America immediately on its publication, which is improbable.

On the other hand, Macaulay's contributions to the Edinburgh Review were early reprinted in America. Five volumes were issued. The English Cyclopædia gives 1840 as the date, but probably this was the commencement only, since it is well known that all the most celebrated pieces were reprinted soon after publication, and this on Warren Hastings would not have been neglected. So that Poe, an omnivorous reader, could not have failed to come across them.

Moreover, Macaulay had been in India (which Poe had not), and his famous description of Benares was doubtless based on personal recollections.

Therefore, unless it can be proved that Poe's tale was written before October, 1841, we must conclude that he borrowed from Macaulay, not Macaulay from him.

The question could be positively decided by anyone who has access to the American reprint of Macaulay's Essays, and the first issue of Poe's Tale of the Ragged Mountains.—

Result of No. 18.

IN the first chapter of Vanity Fair it is related that in the cover of the Johnson's Dictionary which Miss Pinkerton presented as a leaving-gift to Miss Amelia Sedley was inserted a copy of "Lines addressed to a young lady on quitting Miss Pinkerton's school at the Mall; by the late revered Doctor Samuel Johnson." We asked our readers for this poem, limiting them to twelve lines.

The best verses sent in are considered to be those of Mr. M. T. Tatham, Northcourt, Abingdon, to whom a cheque for a guinea has been posted. They run thus:

LINES

Addressed to a Young Lady on quitting Miss Pinkerton's School, at the Mall; by the late revered Doctor Samuel Johnson.

Receive, Clarissa, from a friendly hand
These lines composed at Pinkerton's command,
Who, first receiving thee in tender years,
Dispelled alarm and dried thy childish tears,
Tutored the pen with calligraphic care
And taught the nice adjustment of the hair,
Checked the rough word, rebuked the wayward glance,
Imparted music, trained the feet to dance,
Sometimes severe, not uniformly mild,
For she that spares the rod but spoils the child.
May her instructions shape thy future life,
Perfect the maiden and inform the wife?

Many of the others are good, and all are ingenious; but in several cases the writers have forgotten that they speak as Johnson. Here are a few specimens:

Maiden, that half a Decade since did'st come
To find, at School, the Comfort of a Home!
Behold! a Lustrum pass'd, thy Carriage waits
To bear thee from the Hall of Learning's gates.
Subdued in Joy, and happy in Regret,
Poor in thy Wealth, but richer for thy Debt:
Farewell! complete with every borrow'd Grace
Fly to thy loving Parents' proud Embrace!
By Virtue taught, by all the Arts refin'd,
Nor Vice nor Folly shall seduce thy Mind:
Informed, where'er the Fates may cast thy Lot,
To sway a Palace, or t' adorn a Cot.

[E. H. L. W., Hammersmith.]

Emancipated Fair, attention lend
To words of admonition from a friend!
Think not the function of a female soul
To tune the tongue, and teach the eye to roll,
Dispose the colours of the flowing gown,
And idly sip the pleasures of the town.
He who doth riches, beauty, health bestow
Requires a life of virtue here below.
That better portion choose: to lighten Care,
To comfort Poverty, to raise Despair.
Wise as the serpent, harmless as the dove
Be thou: and gain the happiness above!

[A. E. L., Stafford.]

Let not, fair girl, thy heart with grief dilate,
To love, to part, 'tis mankind's hopeless fate.
From Chiswick's classic shade, Minerva's care,
Thy timid youth must part. Let Virtue rare,
Her sovereign sway preserve; and o'er thy soul
Religion's peaceful might keep all control.
Adversity may frown, or Passion burn,
To Pinkerton's wise precepts thou wilt turn.
Nor doubt the wisdom taught thee here by rule
Will aid thy dubious mind in Life's far sterner school.
Thy virtuous course shall bring the Mall renown,
And steadfast Patience win thy changeless crown.

[A. M. M., Machynlleth.]

Exempt to-day from Pinkertonian rule,
Thou art advanced to Nature's ampler school,
Behold, fair Nymph, the auspicious morn to greet
A tome with learning multifarious replete,
From prefatory note to colophon
Evolved by Grub Street's autocratic Don.
Therefrom to captivate Creation's lords,
Select verbose pomposity of words:
Or, if predestined to the virgin state,
The "Swan of Lichfield" thou may'st emulate,
Or Burney's unsophisticated style
With diction Ciceronian defile.

Competition No. 19.

It has often been remarked by readers of novels how few novelists have a gift for nomenclature. Fantastic names are, in the pages of fiction, continually confronting us to the detriment of illusion; or, on the other hand, the names are so bold and plain as almost to repel interest. The happy mean is rarely struck. Yet it should not be so difficult to strike a path between Ermytrude Vavasour and Vivian Hyacinth on the one side, and Jane Crook and John Bigg on the other. We ask competitors this week to solve the problem. A prize of one guinea will be given to the author of the best list of six imaginary names for (1) an ordinarily interesting hero, (2) a beautiful but not remarkable heroine, (3) a parson troubled with religious doubt, (4) a typical squire, (5) a whimsical maiden aunt, and (6) an effeminate artist.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, February 14. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 200. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The "Academy" Bureau.

THE DEVOTEES.

BY DOLF WYLLARDE.

Mr. Wyllarde is a satirist; but the ideas which he sets forth in this story are not so fresh as we should have been glad to find them. The young men who wrap themselves in the solemnities of Art for Art's sake were done to death long ago, and we have no wish that they should be brought to life again. They were dreadful bores. Mr. Wyllarde's variation of the type is as objectionable as the originals were. "There is no art but Art," Mr. Cyril Haughton keeps on saying. That strikes us as a very idiotic remark; but it made a most favourable impression on the mind of a beautiful young woman whom he met in Lady Clarissa Palmer's drawing-room. Instantly we perceive the tendency in which the story is cast. There are bits of smart writing here and there; but they do not suffice to redeem the work.

DARKEST BEFORE DAWN.

BY J. D.

There is a certain pleasantness about this novel. As we read we seem to be listening to the prattle of a young person with a gentle mind and a hopeful outlook. Unfortunately, the plot is old and tiresome, and, though it has a certain boyish merit, the style of narration has no quality that arouses us. J. D. may improve as he gains in years and knowledge, and in perception.

A PRIESTESS OF OLD.

BY "CELTICUS."

This romance of ancient times is obviously the result of much research and much patient toil; but it brings itself into comparison with standard works of the same kind, and does not come out of the test favourably. From the scholar's point of view, it is well written; but it does not arrest our attention as any novel by Sir Walter Scott does. We are sure that the work could not be published with success.

MADE IN GERMANY.

BY A. M. G. C.

It was Miss Clare Roche who was "made in Germany." That is to say, she was educated there. When she came home, at the age of nineteen, she was a fright in the eyes of her mother and her sister. Her clothes were coarse, and shockingly incongruous in Belgrave-square. Soon, however, her mother and the elder daughter had her dressed well enough to attend the Queen's Drawing-room and a ball given by Mrs. Roche in her interest. Being beautiful and unsophisticated, she was socially a great success. Soon trouble came. By mistake Miss Clare gave Miss Roche an over-dose of medicine, and, thinking she had killed her sister, fled to Victoria and set out for France. In the compartment with her was a young woman going to Germany to be a governess. There was a collision of trains; Miss Clare's companion was killed; and Miss Clare stole her companion's testimonials, to be used in pursuit of her own fortunes. The novel ends rightly enough; but it is very harsh. It is neither in pleasant taste nor in good style.

WHAT D'YE LACK?

Ask Miss MILLARD, of Teddington, Middlesex, for any Book ever issued since the advent of printing (however rare or plentiful) up to the very last work published; also of any curio or object of interest under the canopy of heaven, for she prides herself on being enabled, nine times out of ten, to supply these wants. She has the largest assemblage of Miscellaneous Bibliographies in the world, and is always a ready, willing, and liberal buyer for prompt cash.

"A MIGHTY BOOK HUNTRESS."—Confirmation by a gentleman of supreme eminence.

Sir HARRY POLAND, Q.C., says: "He in fact wrote it so that she might use it, as he considered the books a great find....
She will have achieved a wonderful success in book finding."

If a book exists for sale in any book on earth Miss MILLARD (who positively will not fail) will find it; nothing daunts her in this fascinating literary sport. Address all wants

The Thrilling Story of the Adventures of
Lieut. Johansen, the sole companion of
Dr. Nansen after leaving the "Fram."

350 pages, large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

ILLUSTRATED BY NEARLY 70 SPLENDID PHOTOGRAPHS, &c.

WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH.

By Lieut. H. JOHANSEN.

The success of Dr. Nansen's expedition was due in no small degree to Lieut. Johansen's wonderful powers of endurance and indomitable pluck, and Johansen's story has all the interest of a romance. It is essentially a popular account of the great enterprise, and the adventures and vicissitudes make up a romance of real life which has never been exceeded by any previous trustworthy story of travel and adventure. It will undoubtedly prove one of the most popular books of travel of the year.

"The fascination of the Far North will for ever remain powerful enough to draw readers to the manly, cheerful, and accurate record now set forth for the delight of all who love adventure and admire courage and indomitable resolution."—Morning Leader.

Speaker.—"A stirring and excellent story."
Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Chambers has here given us a very vivid and exciting series of pictures of Paris during the siege."

A DRAMA IN SUNSHINE. By H. A. VACHELL, Author of "Quicksands of Faction," &c.

Times.—"A very singular and notable book. The delineation of character down to Mrs. Fish and other ordinary bourgeois types is humorous, adroit, and free from caricature. The scenes of action, of which there are many, are full of spirit, while the descriptions of landscape are telling and brilliant. . . . A highly interesting picture of life, excellent both in character and incident."

"It is obviously a boon to have at convenient service the latest German analysis, and this 'Literature of the Old Testament' supplies it."—Literary World.

"As to matter, it is the work of a scholar who is not afraid of results suggested by fair research, but who never grasps at novelties merely for the sake of originality. In style and language the book reads more like an original than a translation; an original, too, which in its treatment of scripture has escaped the prolix obscurity so commonly complained of in the writings of the author's country."—Church Gazette.

THE ALHAMBRA, and other Poems. By F. B. Money Coutts. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Money Coutts has imagination and feeling in plenty; he has vigour and sincerity of thought; and he has often a very noteworthy felicity of phrase. He is a strong poetic craftsman, and his work is always carefully and delicately finished. It is plain on every page that Mr. Coutts is a serious and strenuous craftsman, who places a fine and individual faculty at the service of a lofty ideal."—Daily Chronicle.

THE LAST BALLAD, and other Poems. By John Davidson. Poep, 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"Mr. John Davidson, when the fine frenzy of inspiration is upon him, writes verse that must appeal to all who have any poetical instinct. His imagination glows and his phrases strike home. He stands among the few writers of the day who really write poetry, and 'The Last Ballad, and other Poems' is a volume in which his finer qualities are evident."—Times.

THE SILENCE of LOVE. Poems. By Edmond Holmes Pott 4to, 3s. 6d. net.

"A volume of quite uncommon beauty and distinction. The Shakespearian influence that is suggested shows that the author has gone to school with the best masters, and his mastery of the form he has chosen gives the best evidence of conscientious workmanship."—Times.

THE COLLECTED POEMS of WILLIAM WATSON. With Portrait by Edmund H. New. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. (Third Edition.)

Also a LARGE-PAPER EDITION of 160 Copies for England and America.
"The swing and rush of the verse in the great themes; its epigrammatic felicity in others; its mastery in all of the science of this highest of the high arts, will make the volume a model for the craftsman, an abiding delight to all who possess what, we fear, must still be called the acquired taste for fine things finely said."—Daily News.

THE SEQUEL TO "AYLWIN."

THE COMING of LOVE: Rhona Boswell's Story, and other Poems.

By THEODORE WATTS DUNTON, Author of "Aylwin." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
"In 'The Coming of Love' (which, though published earlier, is a sequel to 'Aylwin') he has given us an unforgettable, we cannot but believe an enduring portrait; one of the few immortal women of the imagination. Rhona Boswell comes again into 'Aylwin.'"—Literature.

DREAM DAYS. Eight New Golden Age Stories by Kenneth Grahame. Crown 8vo, uniform with "The Golden Age," 3s. 6d. net. (Second Edition.)

"In 'Dream Days' we are conscious of the same magic touch which charmed us in 'The Golden Age.' There is a magic in all the sketches, but it is perhaps in 'Its Walls were as of Jasper'—the beautiful title of a beautiful story—that Mr. Grahame stands confessed as a veritable wizard."—Literature.

"Happy Mr. Grahame! who can weave romances so well."—Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in Daily Telegraph.

PAN and the YOUNG SHEPHERD: a Pastoral. By Maurice Hewlett. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. (Second Edition.)

"A deliberate essay on the part of Mr. Hewlett in a special literary form. Instead of writing a piece of conscious artificiality, he has given us a poem touched with a subtle grace, and inspired with the spirit of romance."—Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in Daily Telegraph.

THE SPIRIT of PLACE, and other Essays. By Alice Meynell. Poep, 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"This past-mistress of rhythmic and deep-thoughted prose."—St. James's Gazette.
"A rare book. One cannot believe that a writer whose perceptions are so fine but so human, whose reflections are so fine but so just, can write anything one would not wish to read."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THREE NEW NOVELS.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

NOW READY, SECOND EDITION.

IDOLS. By William J. Locke, Author of "Derelicts."

"The Baron strongly recommends Mr. William J. Locke's 'Idols' to all novel-readers. It is well written; no time is wasted in superfluous descriptions; there is no fine writing for fine writing's sake; but the story, the general probability of which is not to any appreciable extent discounted by two improbabilities, will absorb the reader. At all events, it is a novel that, once taken up, cannot willingly be put down until finished."—THE BARON DE B-W, in Punch.

THE CALIFORNIANS. By Gertrude Atherton. (Third Edition.)

"The ablest woman writer of fiction now living."—British Weekly.
"That Mrs. Atherton is one of the most accomplished novelists of her country there can be no manner of doubt."—Standard.

THE ROMANCE of a RITUALIST. By Vincent Brown, Author of "Ordeal by Compassion."

"A very fine piece of work. Asgar's mother is one of the sweetest women we have met in fiction for many a long day. The book is so well written, the dialogue so well managed, the other characters so happily lit off, that 'The Romance of a Ritualist' is a book to be read."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Literary Week.

DR. GARNETT has resigned his post as Keeper of the Printed Books at the British Museum, thus anticipating the natural expiration of his term by some months. The resignation takes effect from March 20. On another page will be found interesting particulars of Dr. Garnett's long period of association with the British Museum.

THE publication of the Browning love-letters has made an immediate impression to which it would be difficult to find a parallel. Our review of this most interesting work is deferred until next week. Meanwhile we might note the feeling of incongruity, almost painful in its sharpness, which was excited in many minds by the juxtaposition, in so many of the contents bills of Wednesday's papers, of such a line as "The Brownings' Love-Letters" and the more glaring incidents—murder, war, and litigation—of daily life. To think that the secret confidences of such a delicate, retiring mind as Mrs. Browning's should be thus exploited was to receive a shock. But no one can regret that these documents have been made accessible.

"BIRRELLING" is really a charming practice. It is soothing and amusing, and in a gentle way stimulating. Mr. Birrell, who is the only man that can do it, has been birrelling again. He birrellled on Sheridan to the members of the London Fife Association on Wednesday. It was not exactly a lecture on Sheridan; it was not exactly a discourse on Sheridan; it was just a birrelling on Sheridan. The audience was happy, and "(laughter)" occurs throughout the report. There was "(laughter)" when it was said of the works of Prof. Smythe, Sheridan's tutor, that they were to be found in second-hand book-shops; there was "(laughter)" when it was said that Shakespeare commentators were enough—we do not want Sheridan commentators. The evening must have been a very agreeable one. We can think of nothing more pleasant than to lie on a convalescent's couch in a comfortable house and be birrellled to.

PUBLISHING by newspaper is likely to become a still stronger factor in the distribution of books. It has been announced that the Daily Telegraph will shortly enter the field into which the Times, Daily Chronicle, and Daily Mail have already adventured. The books to be issued from Peterborough-court are said to be "the hundred best novels." We understand, however, that this announcement, though not without foundation, is somewhat premature. The arrangements for such a publishing scheme are necessarily complicated, and until documents are signed no really definite announcement is possible.

"CAVENDISH" is dead. The news will not affect readers generally as it will touch those that play cards. For "Cavendish" was a great authority on whist and other games in which the Devil's picture-books figure. In private life he was Mr. Henry Jones, a retired doctor. One odd thing about his career is that at first he kept the secret of his pseudonym so carefully that his father, who was a great whist player, would invoke the authority of "Cavendish" over some problematic point, without the slightest idea that he was resorting to family opinion.

DURING 1898, enormous as were the sums paid to professional writers, the men of action carried away the palm as to prices. Lord Kitchener was offered £5,000 for the baldest volume on the Soudan campaign he might care to write. "No thank you, I shall remain a soldier," he replied. Admiral Dewey was offered £1,000 for a magazine article on the Philippines. "Thanks, but I'm too busy," he replied. Lieut. Hobson accepted £1,200 for an article on his great manœuvre, but refused £10,000 for a course of lectures. At the outset Lieut. Hobson was offered for his articles only £1,000. By putting the transaction into the hands of his lawyer, he screwed up the sum to £1,200: another argument in favour of the literary agent. Mr. Fisher Unwin, by the way, is about to publish Lieut. Hobson's article in book form with many illustrations.

THE request made to Mr. Ruskin, in one of the birthday addresses, that Mr. Holman Hunt should paint his portrait, has received a negative. His present state of health, say those who know him best, would not permit Mr. Ruskin to face the fatigue of sitting to so laborious and conscientious a painter as Mr. Holman Hunt. This, we presume, will be the end of the project. It is hardly likely that a less laborious and conscientious painter will be put forward.

RUSSIA loves books more than we are apt to think. It has insisted on sharing with us the pleasure of reading Mr. Jerome's Second Thoughts of an Idle Fellow; and now we learn that in future the express trains from Moscow to Sevastopol will each be equipped with a library placed in the dining-car, to be at the free disposal of the passengers. We may be permitted to surmise that Verestschagin's Napoleon in Russia (detailing the flight from Moscow) will be popular on this railway.

WE have received, and forwarded to the editor of the Oban Times, another donation to the William Black Life-boat Fund: £5 from Miss Honnor Morten.

A FRENCH journalist has been asking certain English men of letters to name the French authors, now dead, which in their opinion best represent the distinctive genius of France, and the replies have been printed in the Gaulois and the Morning Post. Altogether they are rather disappointing, possibly because the question is too large a one. Among those that answer concisely is Mr. Meredith, who makes this choice: "For human philosophy, Montaigne; for the comic appreciation of society, Molière: for the observation of life and condensed expression, La Bruyère; for a most delicate irony scarcely distinguishable from tenderness, Renan; for high pitch of impassioned sentiment, Racine. Add to these your innumerable writers of mémoires and pensées, in which France has never had a rival."

MR. GOSSE also names five leading authors: Villon, Ronsard, Racine, Balzac, and Flaubert, with reasons for each. Prof. Saintsbury declines to select. All are necessary, he says in effect. Mr. Frederic Harrison sends a list of thirty names. Mr. J. E. C. Bodley writes what might stand for a new chapter of his work on France. Mr. Pinero names no names, but says instead: "Speaking generally, however, I would say that those French authors whose works are most characteristic of the genius of France are those writers who have possessed the quality of intellectual vivacity—those, in short, who have been witty yet profound, sparkling yet never merely frivolous. This quality of intellectual vivacity is, I believe, the great, and in its most eminent degree the unique, possession of Frenchmen."

MR. LANG gives "Chanson de Roland, Joinville, Froissart, Ronsard, Villon, Montaigne, Molière, Pascal, Dumas père, Théophile Gautier, Hugo, the Abbé Prévost, André Chénier, Racine, Rabelais, Lamartine, Corneille, Renan, La Bruyère, Balzac, and all the rest, including the author of Aucassin and Nicoleta." Mr. Haggard confines himself to Balzac and Dumas; Mr. Hall Caine to Hugo and Flaubert; and Mr. Justin McCarthy to Montaigne, Pascal, Molière, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Victor Hugo. Mr. Arthur Morrison, after a dip into picturesque criticism ("Balzac—vast, elemental—a frowning rock of literature"), votes for La Fontaine. Mr. Anthony Hope and Dr. Conan Doyle fence with the question, and give personal preferences instead. Mr. Hope's are for Montaigne, Rabelais, and Maupassant. Dr. Doyle's have changed with years. He says: "When I was ten years of age I liked Gustave Aimard best. At fifteen I preferred Jules Verne. At twenty it was Dumas père and Erckmann-Chatrian. Now I should choose Maupassant. He has the most natural instinct for telling a story in the right way of any writer I know."

DR. CONAN DOYLE'S Teynbee Hall readings from his own books should be followed by similar entertainments by other authors. In America the practice is fairly common and very popular. The "massive novelist," as the Daily News calls Dr. Doyle, began with the comic ballad of the motor car, in Songs of Action, proceeded with some of the exploits of Brigadier Gerard, and finished with the ride from Brighton to London in Rodney Stone: thus devoting the evening very much to vigour and excitement. So many are his works that he might give a dozen other readings quite as interesting as this one and never repeat an item.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS, writing in the Dome, suggests a new field for modern verse. Fine poetry is now being written, he admits, but from it "the greatest thing of all is lacking—some great compelling thought, some rapturous and passionate purpose." Mr. Phillips therefore urges upon his companion poets the study of the world beyond the grave, not as Dante saw it, but as our own speculators see it: the world where the soul creates its own atmosphere, environment, and scenery:

Here, at least, is a conception capable of infinite variety of treatment, with all the fascination of scientific truth. We are even shown whole cities built again on the void, house by house, room by room, by the furious act of the inhabitants, who after death transported into space the "scenery of their sins." Another fixed characteristic of the picture presented to us is the continuity of existence: that the madman is no less mad from the fact that he has died, but raves on there as here; that the adulterer still sighs; that the drunkard haunts the familiar tavern, and, incapable of physical gratification, seeks a borrowed delight in urging to excess those who are still in the body.

It does not seem that the new poetry will be a very cheerful affair.

"YET to those," Mr. Phillips remarks, "who object that such a meditation as is here hinted at has no present interest, and brings no newer gleam into the life we are now leading, I would reply that such a conception illumines this present existence to a degree hitherto unconceived. For just as astronomy has taught us that our star, so far from being the centre of creation, is but a drop of light in an abyss, so this spiritual knowledge reminds us that this life is but a passing phase in an uninterrupted and everlasting existence."

THESE are the ten commandments for authors as printed in the new report of the Society of Authors:

(1.) Never to sign any agreement, of which the alleged cost of production forms an integral part, until the figures have been proved.

(2.) Never to enter into any correspondence with publishers, especially with those who advertise for MSS., who are not recommended by experienced friends or by this Society.

(3.) Never, on any account whatever, to bind themselves down to any publisher for future work.

(4.) Never to accept any proposal of royalty until they have ascertained what the agreement, worked out on both a small and a large scale, will give to the author and what to the publisher.

(5.) Never to accept any pecuniary risk or responsibility whatever without advice.

(6.) Never, when a MS. has been refused by respectable houses, to pay others, whatever promises they may put forward, for the production of the work.

(7.) Never to sign away foreign, which include American, rights, but to keep them by special clause. To refuse to sign any agreement containing a clause which reserves them for the publisher. If the publisher insists, take away the MS. and offer it to another.

(8.) Never to sign any paper, either agreement or receipt, which gives away copyright, without advice.

(9.) To keep control over the advertisements, if they affect the returns, by clause in the agreement. To reserve a veto. If ignorant of the subject, to make the Society their adviser.

(10.) Never to forget that publishing is a business, like any other business, totally unconnected with philanthropy, charity, or pure love of literature.

To this decalogue a light-hearted correspondent, who would seem not to have suffered from his publisher to the ordinary alleged extent, sends us the following additions:

(11.) To stimulate your washerwoman to write, under threat of the displeasure of the author of The Pen and the Book if she doesn't.

(12.) In imaginative moments to practise (publishers') ledgerdemain.

(13.) To remain studiously dull, and thus continue a fit object for the Society's interest.

(14.) Never to meet a publisher in the street without at once giving him into custody.

IN noticing last week Gösta Berling's Saga, a remarkable novel translated from the Swedish, our reviewer assumed that the author was a man. On the contrary, Selma Lagerlöf is a Swedish lady. Other translations from her works may be expected soon.

MR. WHISTLER'S inclusion of Mr. Wedmore among persons more or less amusingly goaded at in The Gentle Art of Making Enemies, has apparently had little effect on Mr. Wedmore's admiration of Mr. Whistler's art, for he has lately been enlarging his Study and Catalogue of Mr. Whistler's etchings for speedy publication by Messrs. Colnaghi & Co.

ANOTHER anecdote relating to the bewildering handwriting of the late Mr. James Payn is told in connexion with Miss Jane Barlow's first contribution—a poem—to Cornhill. "She was dreadfully vexed," says the storyteller, "and disgusted upon receiving a postcard from the editor, Mr. Payn, which she interpreted to say, 'I have no use for silly verses.' She sat with it in her pocket for some hours, feeling very miserable, then she took it out again, and with the help of her family deciphered it with a different result. The editor's message turned out to be, 'I hope to use your pretty verses.'" Subsequently Miss Barlow became a regular contributor to Cornhill.

THACKERAY'S remark as to the friendly attitude of the American papers during his American tour, quoted by Mrs. Ritchie in one of the prefaces to the new edition of his works, has produced a commentator in the Dial, who reminds us that the Boston Courier advised its readers that Thackeray was giving his audiences "a mere retailing of old anecdotes, fragments without originality or any sense of judgment, containing nothing which anybody with a file of old newspapers and magazines might not have said."

WE observe that Mr. Thomas Wright's laborious and interesting Life of Daniel Defoe, published at a guinea, may now be had at the "remainder" price of four shillings. Another good book of its kind, Mrs. Basil Holmes's The London Burial Grounds, published at half a guinea, is reduced to three shillings by a "remainder" bookseller. Matthew Arnold's Letters, in two volumes, still go for four shillings and sixpence.

THE attendance at the Guildhall Library has lately shown a considerable falling off. This is especially the case in the evenings. The cause of the depletion is believed to be the increase in the number of suburban libraries. The result may be a shortening of the hours during which the Guildhall Library is open.

WE continue to receive letters on the subject of new words. One correspondent, "M. C.," writes: "Apropos of your search for new words, have you never felt the need of one to correspond with the German 'Geschwister,' which would include both the terms 'brother' and 'sister,' as 'parents' includes both 'father' and 'mother'? I beg to suggest 'fraster,' to supply the want. Another needed word, in my opinion, is 'misclad,' to signify 'tastelessly dressed' (not necessarily 'ill-dressed')."

ANOTHER correspondent, "J. R. L.," asks for "a new word to describe the subjects of Queen Victoria, from Hyde Park to Hobart, from the Solomon Islands to Soringapatam. 'English' certainly will not cover them; British is worse. The word is wanted. The Imperial destiny of the race demands it. And it would be worth while to have it if only for the purpose of affording Mr. Rudyard Kipling a theme for a rousing poem." And "T. P. K." suggests to our notice the word "merri-maniac," which "stands for a man who indulges in small epigrams such as are found by the dozen in Mr. H. Seton Merriman's novels. One-quarter of them are true, three-quarters trite."

A CORRESPONDENT sends us a better version—Dean Ramsay's own—of one of the stories contributed to our Prize Competition page two weeks ago: "At a prolonged drinking bout one of the party remarked 'What gars the laird of Garskadden luk sae gash?' 'Ou,' says his neighbour, 'Garskadden's been wi' his Maker three twa hours; I saw him step awa, but I didna like to disturb gude company.'"

FROM the dedications of the week. Mr. Whibley's edition of Holland's Suetonius, in the "Tudor Translations":

Bibliographical.

"ARE we so soon forgot?" The newspapers have been dwelling upon the present Lord Tennyson's personal performances in literature with reference to his appointment as Colonial Governor, but, so far as my observation has gone, have omitted all reference to his most "original" effort—a version in English hexameters of the recondite story of "Jack and the Beanstalk." This was published so long ago as 1886, in the lifetime of the author's father, and attracted, if I remember rightly, singularly little attention, though it was set forth in a fairly imposing quarto, and adorned with drawings by the delightful Caldecott. The Life of Tennyson is a valuable work, but look at the material therefor, and think how much better it might have been! The present Lord is, I believe, a very intelligent as well as amiable man, and, I understand, he saw through the press certain of his uncle Frederick's later books of verse. He could, no doubt, write a very interesting memoir of the said uncle, though the material probably is slight.

The late Mr. Walter Hamilton was the author of a History of the Poets Laureate of England; but the book was obviously inadequate, and one hopes that some day somebody will deal with the subject (which is not particularly interesting, by the way,) more satisfactorily. Not less disappointing was Mr. Hamilton's enormous collection of parodies in verse. This was a mere omnium gatherum, simply a bringing together of material. No critical judgment was shown in it; all was fish that got into the editorial net. A really careful collection of verse parodies would be a desirable thing, if feasible—which it is not, for so much of the best work in that kind is copyright, and will remain so for some years to come; and, meanwhile, more good parodies may be written. As it is, those who desire to possess the best rhythmical travesties in the language have quite a small library to acquire, so many are the volumes in which they are contained.

So Mr. Fisher Unwin is to give us the Complete Poems of Miss Mathilde Blind. Well, let us hope that there is room for them. The lady was tolerably industrious as a verse producer: she presented to us in succession The Prophecy of St. Oran, and Other Poems (1881), The Heather on Fire (1886), The Ascent of Man (1889), Dramas in Miniature (1891), Songs and Sonnets (1893), and Birds of Passage (1895). I should have thought that the selection from her verses made by Mr. Arthur Symonds, some fourteen or fifteen months ago, would have fully met the demands of the public; it is rarely that the public asks for the complete works of a minor poet. But we shall see what we shall see. Mr. Unwin may be right, and I wrong.

The other day Mrs. Meynell published a little volume of essays called The Spirit of Place, and now "Vernon Lee," one of the other ladies who contribute regularly to the Autolycus columns of the Pall Mall Gazette, announces a book of discourses which is to be called Genius Loci—a rather curious collocation.

A literary interest, if nothing more, attaches to the performances of Ben Jonson's "Alchemist" which the Elizabethan Stage Society proposes to give at the Apothecaries' Hall next week. These representations must needs have attraction for the literary student, but on the playgoer, I fear, they will have no specially magnetic effect. Even in 1787, when the "comedy" was played as "a farce" at Drury-lane, it had become, Genest says, so obsolete that it was "hissed by some persons in the gallery." "The 'Alchemist,'" wrote Hazlitt, "is the most famous of the author's comedies, though I think it does not deserve its reputation. It contains all that is quaint, dreary, obsolete, and hopeless in this once-famed art, but not the golden dreams and disappointments." It is a pity that the Elizabethan Stage Society dissipates its energies over such poor material; it might be so much better employed.

The playgoing world has been troubled for some time past by the dramatised novel. Now we are face to face with yet another scourge—the "novelised" drama. Tomorrow (Saturday) Mr. Macqueen will publish, he says, the story which Mr. Wilson Barrett and Mr. R. S. Hichens have based upon the play by the former, called "The Daughters of Babylon." Only a day or two ago Mr. W. Sapte, jun., put forth a tale entitled A Lucky Dog, which he had founded on a farcical comedy so-named, written and produced by him some six or seven years since. The prospect is melancholy. It is bad enough that some of us should be constrained to go and see the modern drama. It is doubly bad that some of us should also be more or less compelled to read that drama all over again in the shape of a fictitious narrative. Can nothing be done to check the progress of the "novelised" play?

An obliging correspondent sends me a cutting from the Dublin Daily Express, from which I gather that the Miss L. M. Little on whom the Quarterly Review has recently conferred a doubtful immortality is a sister of a certain "Grace Rhys," whom I take (pray pardon me if I am wrong) to be the wife of Mr. Ernest Rhys, that industrious literary gentleman. The verses which Miss Little addresses to her sister in the cutting I refer to are flowing and not undistinguished, though they do not suggest that the writer's work absolutely called for Quarterly honours.

Mr. Fisher Unwin informs me that the author of the novel Brown, V.C., noticed last week, is the same Mrs. Alexander who wrote The Wooing O't. There was a doubt by reason of the quotation marks enclosing her name. These, says Mr. Unwin, were placed there because in private life the lady is known by another name. By the way, on the cover is a picture—somewhat loud in colouring—of a young woman of to-day. At the head of the picture is the title of the tale; at the foot of it the name of the author. Is the picture, therefore, a portrait of "Mrs. Alexander"? A contemporary suggests that it is; but I fear he is a wag. "Mrs. Alexander" (i.e., Mrs. Hector) has seen over seventy summers, and is quite a "grand old woman" in the world of fiction.

Landor and Rose—Water.

Letters of Walter Savage Landor, Private and Public. Edited by Stephen Wheeler. (Duckworth & Co. 10s. 6d.)

ALL know, at least by repute, the character of Walter Savage Landor; for has it not been caricatured in Dickens' Boythorn? Not for nothing did he bear the prefix "Savage." As King Hal says to mine Ancient: "It sorts well with your fierceness." And has not his descendant felt it necessary to justify that family prefix by ferocious experiences in Thibet? It is a thousand pities that to the elder Landor did not fall that terrible adventure. In the first place, his published language about the mild Thibetan would have been powerful to outlast marble monuments. Moreover, his talk on the subject would have been distinctly precious. It would have run somewhat like this: "Pain? I never felt pain in my life. I defy you to make me feel pain! Why, sir, I was tortured by a set of scoundrelly Thibetan savages—I'll be sworn, sir, within an inch of my life; and then set a-horseback with a spike, sir, a rascally spike in the saddle; and so rid the whole way back to the Indian frontier—spiked, sir, like a dismountable lead soldier! And I'll be shot if I ever enjoyed a better ride in my life! I could have ridden it back again, to show the torturing miscreants what a Briton was like with such a seat."

But in vain will you look here for a touch of Boythorn.

These letters to Miss Rose Paynter (now Lady Graves-Sawle) are avowedly published to show the gentler side of Landor. All the world knows that he had a youthful attachment for the Rose Aylmer whom he has immortalised in an exquisite little lyric. In later life he met at Florence Mrs. Paynter, never encountered since, as a little girl, she had run by the side of her elder sister in those tenderly remembered days of his young love. A friendship naturally arose with one to whom he could talk of the dead Rose; and it happened that of her two daughters one bore the name and some lineaments of her mother's sister. To this girl he accorded a special affection—part memory of the mouldered, part admiration of the budding, Rose. He kept up correspondence with her to the end of his life; sent her verses every birthday, and others at chance intervals. These letters, with the interspersed verses, Mr. Wheeler, with the lady's permission, now for the first time gives to the world.

It is comprehensible that the object of so faithful an attachment should cling to, and the editor (as a devotee of Landor) act on, the principle de mortuis nil nisi bonum. It is excusable that she should shrink from exhibiting her old friend's little asperities of temper, should think they had already been too liberally exposed to the public, and desire that nothing be allowed to roughen the little idyllic picture of Omphale and Heracles. But we would the editor had taken his courage in his hands and advised her otherwise. The very fact that Landor's character is so fully known makes suppression useless to his memory, and irritatingly flawing to the artistic effect. Nobody can be persuaded into accepting this halcyon view of the great writer. Nobody but is fretted into protest against this Landor among the Roses. What is worse, a picture is pruned and tamed into unconvincingness, which would have been really charming, left with its natural relief and contrast. Ares at the feet of Aphrodite—a very pretty scene. But let us have a growl or two, an occasional martial tang of the tongue, or rugged fling of the limbs, to convince us that we have, indeed, the god of War, and no other, bound in these rosy links and manacles. We should feel much more sensibly the poet's self-yielding gentleness, and the young lady's triumph, if her lion were allowed an occasional roar—to show us he is the real sort, and not of those who eat plum-cake and box with unicorns; if he did not always "shake a mano en papillottes." Furthermore—and this is the utmost verge and scope of our indictment—he would not then be dull. Landor—Landor in his frank and unconsidered moments—dull, pitiful heavens! Yet to this complexion is he come, through Mr. Wheeler's injudicious showmanship. These letters become positively languid and tedious. We yawn in sympathy with the frequent hiatus which disfigures these pages, and look disgustedly at the enshrouding asterisks which fill it. What could Landor have said so very dreadful? we ask; and whatever it was, we could suffer it gladly: yea, we would beg—"Let him roar again! Let him roar again!" as warmly as the audience of Bottom's imagining. We love not Landor with a nice clean collar and his hair combed.

Well, here is our Landor, expurgated for the use of families and suitable as a present for young ladies' schools —at least, the first half of the volume. Of course, there are interesting bits, and we see the old poet in a very pleasing and domestic light—only too much so. He writes to Rose's mother in 1838 :

Yesterday I breakfasted with Milnes. He invited a good number of his cleverest friends to meet me. I did him wrong in fancying I had lost a portion of his kind feelings. . . . Lady Blessington has persuaded me to remain a few days longer, that I and D'Orsay may be accompaniments to her in a picture. So flattering a wish is not to be denied.

This letter is from Gore House. Does the picture exist, one wonders? It would be of exceeding interest. A more curious combination for a portrait-group could scarce be conceived than Lady Blessington, D'Orsay, and Landor! He was much at Gore House about this time. Mr. Wheeler reminds us that Mr. Augustus Hare relates how Landor talked to him about the company at Gore House, and how, while Lady Blessington and D'Orsay talked, Disraeli would sit "silently watching their conversation as if it were a display of fireworks." One does not conceive Disraeli "silently watching" anyone's conversation. He must have been taking lessons for his own future displays. But the note on this letter is more interesting than the letter itself. It quotes Crabb Robinson's note regarding Landor's breakfast with him the following day: "A great deal of rattling on the part of Landor. He maintained Blake to be the greatest of poets; that Milnes is the greatest poet now living in England." Milnes was present, it may be remarked. It is interesting to know that Landor, in 1838, saw the greatness of Blake while he was still an unknown quantity to English critics. But there was always "a great deal of rattling on the part of Landor." When he affirmed Blake to be the greatest of poets, it meant no more than that he admired him much. As for the judgment on Milnes, a graceful, quite minor poet, it is purely one of Landor's oddities—even allowing for the influence of Milnes' presence. The man could not say a thing without hyperbole. For he it remembered Tennyson was "living in England," and the Quarterly (as Mr. Wheeler reminds us) jeered Milnes for his worship of "such baby idols as Mr. John Keats and Mr. Alfred Tennyson." Thus contemporary criticism "wanders at its own sweet will."

We have another curious specimen of Landor's critical whims in a letter of 1843. He tells Miss Rose that certain verses want compression, "as nearly all modern poetry does, particularly Byron's. Cowper, Crabbe, and Moore run the least into this fault since the time of Goldsmith. There is much of the superfluous even in Gray's beautiful elegy." The remark is true enough regarding most poetry of that day. But fancy the exceptions! Cowper, with the interminable didactic longueurs of the "Task," "The Sofa," and the rest; Moore, with the gaudy facility of "Lalla Rookh" and the "Loves of the Angels," and superfluous page on page which one shrinks even from remembering! It is correct enough of Gray. But in the Imaginary Conversations he not only declared that the Elegy would be read as long as any work of Shakespeare, "despite the moping owl and the tin kettle of an epitaph tied to its tail"; but also said :

"Expunge from his Elegy the second and third stanzas, together with all those which follow the words

Even in our ashes live their wonted fires, and you will leave a poem with scarcely a blemish—a poem which will always have more readers than any other in any language." The italics are ours. Of course he merely intended that it would always be a very popular poem; but superlatives were his bread of life. Why, though, did he wish away the second stanza? You know it, reader :

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his drony flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds.

Surely it is one of the best in the poem. Or why should he have said, again, that he would sooner have written the stanza beginning

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power, together with one of George Herbert's, than any other in poetry? A stanza the solemn movement of which makes it undeniably fine; but how far below the great inspired passages of poetry! It has a lapidary dignity, as of some thing carved in stone; but Landor's praise is extreme. Truth to say, he had himself a tendency to leading out by the hand spinster phrases, to personifications constructed chiefly of initial capitals, which at times recalls the eighteenth century manner. He would apostrophise his "pensive friend" (virtuous youths and maidens were apt to be "pensive" in the eighteenth century), would talk about "the pomps of regal state," and inform his pensive friend that

Thee only Virtue can elate,
She only leads thy steps to Love.

Virtue, in this style, acquires corporeal substance and the right to a "she" by title of a large "V." With a small "v" poor virtue becomes a mere "it"—and quite helplessly unpoetical. There is, indeed, only one poem in this volume that is at all rememberable.

Landor seems, again, to attach a curiously overweening value to French verse compared with English. But let us acknowledge that he is entirely right about the "moping owl." Owls are the most active of birds at night. And he has the boldness—with a half-apology—to tell Miss Rose Paynter some little truths about her private verses. Then—classic poet though he was—he has a hearty enthusiasm for Gothic architecture and York Minster. And he shows a true native taste for music, though professing no knowledge of it. Here is an interesting little notice :

A German boy named Rubenstein has been playing to us [at Gore House] on the pianoforte. Never did I hear anything so wonderful and of so pure a taste at the same time. Wonder, where it exists at all, generally predominates over every other feeling; not so in him. He appears to be about eleven or twelve years old.

There is, however, a second section, of political and public letters, where we have the unwhittled Landor. The mere style often makes them interesting; and there are general remarks couched in memorable language, and worth memory. The case against Russia has never been put so well as by him and here. But in detailed politics the most striking thing is the wonderful crop of prophecies that failed, and the imperturbable confidence with which he goes on to make new ones destined to a like fate. Once he claims to have had a prophecy fulfilled (about Louis Napoleon), and on the strength of this he feels free to prophesy at large for the rest of his days. Happy, hot-headed, self-confident prophet, whose blacks to his own blest sight are for ever white! Isaiah had no such felicity, Jeromiah no such confidence. Read the book, and thank—with some permissible grumbling—the editor; for half Landor is better than no Landor at all.

A Man and His Destiny.

The Life of George Pomeroy Colley. By Lieut.-General Sir William F. Butler. (John Murray. 21s.)

"Oh, my men, don't run!" The speaker was the outlaw Tola, who was reputed the best fighting man in Kaffir land, and was the terror of the country between the Buffalo and Kei rivers. Twice had young George Colley attempted the extinction of this brave, when just before Christmas, 1858, he heard that a man had been attacked and wounded by Tola's band. Collecting a small body of police, Colley marched them sixty miles in two days, and saw Tola's fires in the bush. Tola's men were twenty-five; the police were sixteen, but were reinforced, and, in the fierce hand-to-hand skirmish which followed, Tola was killed. Colley described the affair in a letter:

Tola fought splendidly. When the fresh men came up, his people began to give; but Tola called out: "Oh, my men, don't run. Follow me!" His two sons and one or two others sprang to his side, and he made a dash into the centre of my police; and such was the prestige of his name that none of them dared face him, until an old sergeant of great repute for courage met him, and, after a short hand-to-hand combat with assegais, killed him.

Fine doings for a young fellow of twenty-three. But Sir George Grey had detected the ability of the young lieutenant who had charge of a small post in Kaffraria, and had employed and advanced him in quick time. Colley—who was glad to hide his youth under a premature beard—was now border magistrate, or "Chief," on the Bashee river, and controller of 5,000 square miles of South Africa. He was twenty-three, yet his life was half-spent; his gay courage and shrewd sense gave promise of a career longer and brighter than that which ended in gloom and massacre at Majuba Hill.

There is an ironical symmetry in Colley's life that is mournfully attractive, and a correspondence between its incidents and public events which lends it dignity; and both are brought out in this well-written and finely conceived biography by a soldier-penman. Even while the Punjab was bearing him to South Africa Colley's eyes were turned wistfully to the Crimea, where the Allies were closing on Sevastopol. While his horse carried him over the wastes of Kaffraria, his heart was burning with the news that Delhi had fallen. Not Sevastopol, and not Delhi, were to inflame his blood. But the British Empire can usually find work for its Colleys, and the young officer landed with the 2nd Queen's on the Peiho River in China in 1860. The capture of the Taku forts and the destruction of the Summer Palace of the Emperor have been described many times. Colley was not altogether in love with the vandal work he had to do, but the spoliation of this Chinese fairy-land was one of the great scenes in his short, full life. We might follow him back to the Cape, thence to England, where he entered the Staff College, thence to Ashanti, where he organised the transport for Sir Garnet Wolseley, with whom he became linked by strong personal friendship. In 1874 Colley visited the battle-fields of the American Civil War, and next year he started with Sir Garnet Wolseley for South Africa on a civil mission, which had for its aim the adjustment of disputes with the Boers. He had been out less than a year when he accepted the appointment of Assistant Quartermaster-General at Aldershot. Colley had now long been regarded as the "coming man" of the Army. His military knowledge was of the soundest, and his executive ability was a proverb.

On his voyage to England Colley had sage companionship.

I came home from the Cape, and almost lived on the way with Mr. Froude; a mind which I am sure you would have appreciated and enjoyed as thoroughly as I did. I don't know if you are as warm an admirer of his writing as I am; to me there is no English prose equal to some passages of his; such, for instance, as that about the middle of the first chapter of his history—"For indeed a change was coming upon the world." It was rather a sad mind too, sometimes grand, sometimes pathetic and tender, usually cynical, but often relating with the highest appreciation and with wonderful beauty of language some gallant deed of one of his heroes of the fifteenth or sixteenth centuries. He seemed to have gone through every phase of thought, and come to the end "all is vanity." He himself used to say the interest of life to a thinking man was exhausted at thirty or thirty-five. After that there remained nothing but disappointment of earlier visions and hopes. Thank goodness, I have not thought quite so fast! Sometimes there was something almost fearful in the gloom and utter disbelief and defiance of his mind.

Throughout life Colley was the sport of telegrams. Scarcely had he reached Aldershot when Lord Lytton offered him the military secretaryship in India. Instantly he plunged into this new work, mastered the military aspect of the Central Asian question on his voyage to Bombay, and settled down to his various and splendid duties at the Viceroyalty. In his police days in Kaffraria he had read with emotion of the fall of Delhi; he now had to arrange the great pageant at Delhi of December 23, 1876. Not in India was there rest or permanence for Colley. In the midst of all, Sir Garnet Wolseley was jogging his elbow, and reminding him that he would be wanted if war broke out with Russia. That danger passed; but in 1878 Sir Garnet telegraphed to Colley to join him at Natal as chief of his staff. Thus for the third time South Africa called George Pomeroy Colley to her veldts and mountains.

She called him to his death and the eclipse of his fame. When Colley arrived the Zulu war was practically over;

Lord Chelmsford had finished it at Ulundi. But the great Boer trouble of 1881 was beginning, and in January of that year Colley was taking a small column to the relief of Pochofstroom. The repulse of his force at Lang's Nek is matter of history. It was in the attempt to retrieve the honour of his force and, at the same time, execute a brilliant military movement that, on February 27, Colley determined to occupy Majuba Hill by night. His long, stealthy march to the hill-top with 554 rifles, the glee and confidence of his men, the glorious sunrise, the camps of the Boers sleeping the sleep of doomed men (as it seemed) below—all these things we follow with breathless interest. Sir William Butler's powers of description, his sense of the irony of events, his insight into human nature, are equal to the task he has set himself of giving a final narration of the terrible thing that was about to happen. He tells us that for weeks Colley's mind had been uneasy.

Frequently in his letters there comes a stray sentence which shows the presence in his mind of some feeling that a turn had come in that career whose long-continued success he had so often acknowledged. And latterly there had come into his mind a vague impression that even the officers most closely associated with him in this enterprise shared, as it were, the shadow of his altered fortune.

Again, with a fine sense of history, Sir William pauses to show us the pettiness of the struggle :

The sun rose at about a quarter before six that morning, and a very brilliant sunrise it was. The great grass-covered uplands; the long-distant, table-topped mountains, extending far into Zululand; the deep gorges through which the dividing torrent of the Buffalo wound its unseen way—all lay spread below in a panorama where the absence of town, hamlet, or homestead served to emphasise the strange fact which the presence of two hostile camps at the base of the mountain marked—namely, that all this untenanted wilderness, and the enormous wastes that lay removed from sight around it, were not wide enough for the separate dwellings of two kindred European nations.

In the light of that sunrise Highland soldiers laughed as they looked down on the stirring Boer farmers, and shaking their fists in exultation, cried: "Come up here, you beggars." And that is exactly what the farmers did. They came up, shooting straight. The rest of the story is dark, dreadful; but Sir William Butler tells it without shrinking. The one certain fact is the one bright fact. Colley kept his post, while his shouting and panic-stricken men were flying down into the valley of shame.

"Oh, my men, do not run." It was thus he had described, two-and-twenty years earlier, the closing scene in the life of a Kaffir chief far down in the Kaffrarian forest. "When fresh men came up, his people began to give, but Tola called out, 'Oh, my men, don't run, but follow me.'" How strangely strong must the same thought have now come to Colley as that stream of men poured away from him at the Majuba! "Oh, my men, do not run!"

Colley was last seen walking alone on the bullet swept height. And there he fell, accepting his destiny. At first there was a disposition to blame him; but, when all is said, Colley's achievement and character shine unsullied above all that miserable business. He conquered his destiny when he met it meekly on the mountain.

Modern Italian Art.

History of Modern Italian Art. By Ashton Rollins Willard.

With Illustrations. (Longmans. 18s.)

By this time it is a commonplace among the artistic of this country to remark that the divorce of the great primal and standard art of architecture from the rest of the arts has affected one and all of them disastrously, leaving them isolated, enfeebled, inorganic. Neither in any country at the present day is this evil exemplified more clearly than in Italy itself, where at the beginning of the fifteenth century—a hundred years earlier than in other lands—was first set on foot the movement culminating in the disintegration we deplore. The contrary view, however, is taken by the author of the monograph on the painted Morelli, a work which, published in 1894, has now been followed up by a volume of larger scope, designed to embrace the subject of modern Italian art in general. Yet it is significant that, out of seventeen chapters, two only are devoted to architecture, the fifteen remaining being divided between sculpture and painting; while not one treats of any of the many other arts, such as that of the potter, the mosaicist, the goldsmith, the enameller, the smith, the weaver, the embroiderer, or the furniture maker. It is in this restricted sense, then, that the writer, whose peculiar orthography, together with certain un-English turns of speech, such as "guide-board" for "sign-post," "back and forth," &c., bewrays him, must be understood to deal with modern Italian art; and, such as he conceives it, he holds a brief for it as against the opinion of those who see in it only a sad instance of degeneracy. It is no unusual experience that one may travel much in Italy without having reason even to suspect the existence there of an artistic revival akin to that which is taking place in other parts of Europe. Therefore it is good news indeed to learn, on the authority of a writer who, as his elaborate biographical and descriptive catalogue proves, must have spent much time in diligent research into the matter, that things are not so bad as they seem.

Mr. Willard dates the origin of the present art movement in Italy from the middle of the eighteenth century. At that period the discovery of the remains of Herculaneum and Pompeii created a lively disgust with the abysmal depths of baroque into which art had sunk, and inspired the contemporary generation with a taste for something more strictly allied to the antique. Hence sprang the neo-classic revival, of which the sculptor Canova, a famous name to conjure withal, became the most brilliant exponent. Time moves so rapidly that we are liable to forget how influential a personality Canova was in the art world of the early nineteenth century. On his account the eyes of Europe then turned to Italy as the home of artistic light and leading, just as more recently they have come to look upon Paris; nor yet that, perhaps, with equally sound warrant. For, whereas a sense of beauty is often conspicuously wanting in works of the modern French school, in Italy, on the other hand, the instinct for classic grace has become more firmly implanted and manifests itself the more usually in the productions of modern Italians. They have failed, nevertheless, to catch the true monumental spirit which belongs to the sculpture and the painting of an age when both these and all the attendant arts were dominated and kept in train by a living, progressive architecture. Take, for example, a modern Italian effigy—either in paint, marble, or plaster—of the Madonna and Child. The features, maybe, lack not a sort of graceful attractiveness; but that is all. Theirs is the beauty of the boudoir, the professional prettiness of the studio. Where is that august dignity that strikes one with awe in the presence of the lowliest Madonna of Angelico or Botticelli? It is sought for in vain, for the modern manufactured Mary is not the venerable Virgin Mother of tradition, but the self-conscious model, whose downcast dark eyelashes barely veil the pert glances of the coquette. She is the selfsame who, on demand, poses, stripped, as Venus; while her Child for all the world is the boy who, without any change but of attitude and the addition of wings, on the like occasion is Cupid. No; to undo the work of five hundred years it takes more than one century, and then only with unity of purpose; and this kind of unity in our present circumstances cannot well exist at all.

To English readers the most interesting portion of Mr. Willard's book will probably be that on "Pre-Raphaelitism and Romanticism"—two movements which, among ourselves, occurred in the reverse order. It appears that, prior to the revolt against cold classicism in this country, there was in Rome, under the leadership of the German Overbeck, a somewhat similar movement, which was succeeded, in its turn, by the Purist school of Italians. However, although upon its native soil, the movement never flourished there to the extent that it has done in the north, and, in fact, passed away without leaving any permanent mark in Italy. It was, no doubt, unfortunate in the men it had for promoters. In the first place, Overbeck, by identifying himself with the cause of "religious sentimentalism," alienated the sympathy of the more thoughtful; and later on the movement was too undefined and desultory to win any solid stability. The half-hearted Minardi, "much more Raphaelite than Pre-Raphaelite" as he was; and Mussini, too much engrossed with the duties of his office to find leisure for independent study; and Hayez, the Romanticist, most prolific painter of all, yet without consistency of aim, without enthusiasm: these almost necessarily provoked the Verist reaction which followed. And so one movement yields to another and another, and is bound so to yield, nor ever endure any while, until for the caprice of the individual is substituted the earnest conviction of the community, and conditions shall have so altered that art is once more the spontaneous expression of man's pleasure in whatever work, be it great or small, his hand may undertake to do.

The Ancient East.

The Story of Ahikar. By F. C. Conybeare, J. Rendel Harris, and Agnes Smith Lewis. (C. G. Clay & Sons.)

THE Ahikar of the fable is the vizier of the Assyrian king Sennacherib; he has sixty wives, but no son. It is revealed to him that he should take his sister's son into his house and bring him up as his own. He does so, informing the youth's mind with many wise sayings, of which "If it were a loud voice alone that decided the event, the ass could build two houses a day with his braying," is, perhaps, the most noteworthy. In due time the king appoints the nephew to succeed his uncle, when the young man manages, by means of forged letters, to make it appear that his benefactor has plotted to deliver Assyria into the hands of her enemies. The king orders the immediate execution of the innocent accused, but entrusts the carrying out of the sentence to one whom Ahikar has befriended in his prosperity. Thanks to this circumstance, another prisoner is beheaded in his stead, and Ahikar is concealed in an underground chamber, where his nails grow as long as an eagle's claws. The nephew enters into possession of his uncle's property, beats his slaves, and dissipates his goods, until the king of Egypt sends an embassy to Assyria propounding certain puzzles, to be solved under a penalty of three years' tribute on either side. Sennacherib is in despair, until the executioner takes pity on him and produces his old adviser from underground. Ahikar is sent to Egypt to answer the questions, and, by means of trickery and equivocation, secures the stake, with which he returns triumphant. As a reward, his nephew is handed over to him. After a little physical torture, he sets to work to reproach him seriously, and prosed to such an awful extent that the young man literally blows up and dies.

Such is, briefly, the story of Ahikar, of which a Greek, an Armenian, a Syriac, and an Arabic rendering are here given, together with translations of all three, and of a Slavonic and an Æthiopic version as well. Dr. Rendel Harris, in his Introduction, suggests that the story has a Hebrew original, and the anachronisms, the worship of cunning, and the belief that children can be made wise by (to use Charles Kingsley's phrase) "infinite jaw," which appear in it all go to support his view. The extraordinary thing about it is that it appears hardly altered in the Arabian Nights and the Fables of Æsop, while references to it are found certainly in the Book of Tobit, and perhaps in the Old and New Testaments and the Koran. While, therefore, its ethical value appears to be nil, and we cannot share the paternal pride which leads Dr. Rendel Harris to speak of it as a "charming little tale," it is entitled to respect as an undoubted relic of antiquity. From a scholar's point of view, the form in which it is produced by the Cambridge University Press leaves nothing to be desired save an index.

The Temple of Mut in Asher. By Margaret Benson and Janet Gourlay. (John Murray.)

MISS BENSON and Miss Gourlay were warned when they first proposed to excavate on the site of the Temple of Mut, near Luxor, that they would probably find nothing; they were also refused the Government permission now necessary to explorers; but still they persevered. M. Naville's kind interposition procured from the then Director of Antiquities the first permit ever issued to female workers; the assistance of Egyptologists of nearly every nationality did the rest; and in the end they were rewarded for three seasons' work by the gathering-in of a fine crop of antiquities, including the inscribed statue of Queen Hatasu's architect, and the portrait bust of the only bald-headed priest yet found in Egypt. What energy and determination they must have shown to accomplish their task may be judged from the fact that their men insisted on higher wages to compensate them for the indignity of being under the orders of women.

Mut was a not very popular goddess, who was worshipped at Thebes as the consort of Amen and the mother of Khons, the moon-god. She appears to have been in some way a type of maternity; but Miss Benson's researches do not add very greatly to our knowledge of her, the only hymn in her honour which she succeeded in discovering being so damaged as to be untranslatable. On the other hand, she and her companion have done good work in clearing the temple and in correcting the plan of it taken some years ago by Mariette, while they have also obtained several inscriptions of historical interest. A technical discussion of these would here be out of place, but the reader will find them all duly translated and commented upon in the volume before us. The greater part of the book is taken up by a readable history of Egypt during the 2,800 years or so that the Temple of Mut flourished, and a discussion of the Egyptian religion, in which Prof. Wiedemann's views are followed pretty closely. The book is printed in excellent style, and illustrated by photographs taken on the spot.

The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria. By Morris Jastrow, jun., Ph.D. (Boston, U.S.A.: Ginn & Co.)

A book by the Professor of Semitic in the University of Pennsylvania, which forms the second volume of a recently projected series of handbooks on the History of Religions. Prof. Jastrow would divide the early Babylonian pantheon into two great triads, the first consisting of Anu, the god of the sky; Bel, the god of all that is below the sky; and Ea, whom he is inclined to make the god of the sea. The second he makes to consist of Sin, Samas, and Rimmon, the gods of the moon, the sun, and the storm respectively, and all the other deities he considers to be merely local gods, their popularity ranging in exact ratio with the political importance of their seats of worship. Later, Merodach, or Marduk, of Babylon, rose to such importance with the rise of his city that he became a sort of doublet of the elder Bel, while in Assyria the local deity, Ashur, assumed almost from the first the supreme place in the national theology. This accounts for a good number of deities, but there are others—like Nebo, Ninip, and Nergal—whose functions it leaves unexplained, and that Prof. Jastrow does not make their status clear is probably due to the fact that the present state of our knowledge of antiquity does not allow him to do so. A more serious drawback to the usefulness of his book is his adoption of the wild theory that the culture and religion of Babylonia and Assyria were entirely the work of their Semitic inhabitants; and this will not only lead scholars to use the volume with caution, but prevents him from dwelling on a subject of great interest to students of the science of religions—i.e., the evolution of the Babylonian religion from the state of animism which is clearly indicated in the texts. This apart, we have nothing but praise for Prof. Jastrow's book, which might worthily replace as a text-book Prof. Sayce's still brilliant, but now antiquated, Hibbert Lectures. The numerous translations which it contains were made, we understand, expressly for it.

A Militant Philosopher.

On the Realisation of the Possible. By F. W. Bain, Quondam Fellow of All Souls' College. (James Parker.)

HITHERTO we had known Mr. Bain only as the author of a pamphlet circulated in Oxford Common Rooms, in which he proved to his own satisfaction that the Duke of Argyll was a confirmed plagiarist from his works. Now he has assumed a different attitude, and comes forward as a new Ajax defying the Olympians of philosophy. With one part of this work we are in perfect agreement. The enthusiastic appreciation of Aristotle—a defence perhaps scarcely needed in these days when we are all Aristotelians—can offend no one; and the chapter called "The Logic of Nature" is a curious, if somewhat fantastic, piece of system-framing. We are perfectly willing, also, to join with Mr. Bain in classing Lord Bolingbroke and Lord Beaconsfield among the great minds of the human race. "It is insight," says the author, "which breathes in every page of Aristotle, or Bolingbroke, De Retz or Disraeli, and is never found in a Mill or Macaulay, a Ricardo or Descartes." This is merely an honest confession of preferences with which many might agree.

The book is avowedly an attack upon idealism or rationalism in the interests of an Aristotelian philosophy of evolution. Mr. Bain's point of view is not hard to discover. The question as to the sense in which the word existence can be used of spiritual realities is not a new one, and it has been too much neglected by philosophers. Clearly, some consideration is needed before the same word can be made to cover the being of a cow and a logical canon. This difficulty is ever present to the author's mind, and it is the basis of his mania for the "possible." "Esse" is the ground of "posse," the simple observation of existence is the ground of any real "system"; and hence the proximate cause, the last link which bridges over the gulf between the possible and the actual, is, in spite of his inconsistent eulogy of final causes, the main interest in his mind. From this he goes on to confuse a rational spiritual reality with physical existence. The possible is limited to facts of sight, and we are told that all speculation which does not merely define and classify such phenomena is a hypostatizing of abstractions. Descartes, Spinoza, Hume, and Kant are exultantly knocked over by odd little verbal puzzles. It is all exactly like the criticism which an intelligent schoolboy is wont to scribble on the margin of philosophy books in a public school library. The author rarely sees the meaning of the philosopher he overthrows, and when his criticism is just it is generally an accepted commonplace.

But the main wonder of the book is its style. Anything more funnily assertive, more cocksure and intemperate, we have rarely read. "The secret of degeneracy in literature and philosophy is the appearance of women in it. Women are incapable of thought." "Aristotle is the true English philosopher: and yet they have thrown away the royal eagle for wallowing hogs or blinking night-owls." "A critic is one who delights in drawing very obvious conclusions from principles which he has accepted without examination from one who took them on trust from a third person." "To speculate is human: to define, divine. Any human being can speculate; but not one man in a million knows what thinking means. The one is vulgar, easy, attractive, feeble, feminine, and fatal; the other rare, unpopular, male, difficult, and beyond all price." Now and then there is a deft piece of phrasing, for which we are thankful: "Definition is the repetition in thought of the historical causes which made the thing, in fact." "The language of philosophy," he says, "the virtue of which is logical exactitude and crystal clearness, has now become a kind of horrible philosophical Chinese, which violates the first canon of speech—that if two were communicating, both shall understand the meaning of the words"—a criticism, perhaps, not without truth. But soon our author is back at his fulminations. "The world will awake some day and cease to decorate with musk roses the fair, large ears of its Cartesian Bottom." "To shake off the long debauch of sophistry, the deep draughts of stupefying jargon, modern philosophy will have to drink the waters of Lethe and again become a child." Berkeley is "a sham, a parade: show minus substance; esse minus posse; imposing upon those only who take—God bless them!—dialogue for dialectic, verses for poetry, a grinning row of false teeth for Nature's genuine grinders." As for J. S. Mole, he has no language to express his contempt for him; he calls him, in bitter irony, "the nineteenth century prodigy," and then is silent.

Plato "caricatures in his pretty dialogues by the most childish pretence at reasoning." Kant lies "in a dogmatic slumber, contentedly lapped in all the puerilities of spiritualistic, pneumatological metaphysics." Far different is it with Mr. Bain himself. "I wandered," he says, "in the deserted school of the master, and raked in the ashes of his extinct altar, till a spark of his divine genius suddenly glimmered and glowed in the darkness." A restatement of Aristotelianism, a defence of the Schoolmen, an attack upon Idealist abstractions, all are things to be desired; but a book like the present, with its egotism and absurdities of speech, could be only amusing if it were not also a little pathetic.

Notes on New Books.

THE GARDEN.

BOOKS about gardens cannot be dull. It matters nothing who writes them or how they are written; the very words that must be used carry the day: excite expectations, or remind the reader of the sweet reality of lawn and rose and daffodil. Yet although every garden book is readable and stimulating, a good garden book is a treasure; and such a treasure is Wood and Garden (Longmans, 10s. 6d. net), by Gertrude Jekyll. Miss (or Mrs.) Jekyll's plan is to go systematically through the year, describing her little domain and her methods therein month by month. This she does with a gentle, open-air enthusiasm which is very kindling. Thus, to be timely, the February chapter opens:

There is always in February some one day, at least, when one smells the yet distant, but surely coming, summer. [One such came last week.] Perhaps it is the warm, mossy scent that greets one when passing along the southern side of a hedge-bank; or it may be in some woodland opening where the sun has coaxed out the pungent smell of the trailing ground ivy, whose blue flowers will soon appear; but the day always comes. . . .

How strangely little of positive green colour is to be seen in copse and woodland. Only the moss is really green.
The next greenest thing is the northern sides of the trunks of beech and oak.

And so forth, passing from generalities to the garden itself.
The book, which will not be altogether new to readers of the Guardian, is illustrated with some superb photographs taken by the author. We recommend it to amateur gardeners as a most charming blend of outdoor æsthetics and practical counsel. It is also something more: it is a piece of garden literature, written by one who has the sense of style.

THE LIBRARY.

The first book auction held in England was William Cooper's sale of the books of Lazarus Seaman, held in Warwick-court, Paternoster-row, in 1676. This fact is occasionally met with, but the history of the rise and early development of book auctions has long waited for full treatment. Mr. H. B.
Wheatley wrote an interesting chapter or two on the subject in his entertaining, if discursive, volume, The Prices of Books. It has been reserved for Mr. John Lawler, who is principal cataloguer to Messrs. Sotheby, to attempt a comprehensive survey of Book Auctions in England in the Seventeenth Century (Stock). We cannot, therefore, accept Mr. Lawler's plea that the "comparative insignificance" of his book precludes "serious criticism." Not that we have much criticism to offer. Mr.
Lawler's industry has been unbounded, and the worst that can be said of this book is admitted by its author: it might have been more entertaining. There is a desperate thoroughness about the long chapter (seventy pages) on Edward Millington's book auctions, with its recurrent phrases, "Millington's next auction," "Millington's next sale," "Millington's next venture," &c. But the book is a monument of industry and a mine of facts.

VERSE.

A poet with the true lyric sense is, even if he have nothing new to say, always welcome. Therefore we are glad to meet with Mr. Fred. G. Bowles, whose little volume, In the Wake of the Sun (Unicorn Press), has just been published. Mr. Bowles has the rapturous Pantheistic attitude towards nature, and his ecstasies are expressed in melodious and scholarly verse. We select one of the shorter and more timely lyrics:

A SONG OF SPRING.

Kiss! kiss!
For the world is young;
God and thy bliss
Are on every tongue!
He is veiled in the leaf
He is hid in the cloud,
And the wave on the reef
Chaunts His praises aloud—
Hark! Hark!
Low to the wren,
And high to the lark—
God's here again.

Mr. Bowles's book is musical and fresh and wholesome throughout.

Major Whyte-Melville as poet is known by but half-a-dozen songs: "The Galloping Squire," "A Rum One to Follow, a Bad One to Beat," "The Monks that Live Under the Hill," "Boots and Saddles," "Brown Bay and Tray," and one or two more—these are familiar and spirited; but the society-magazine sentiment of the writer's non-sporting verse is little to the point. In a complete edition of Whyte-Melville, however, everything must have a place, and we do not, therefore quarrel with the Songs and Verses as a whole that Messrs. Ward & Lock have just issued. But we miss from it that excellent and pathetic ditty—"Wrap me up in my tarpaulin jacket, and say a poor buffer lies low," which, in the song-books where it appears, wedded to a plaintive and engaging air, very attractive to concerted smokers, is always attributed to the Major. And here, although it is not verse, we may mention the handsome reprint of Whyte-Melville's Market Harborough just added to Messrs. Thacker's edition. Inside the Bar is bound up with it, and the book has good illustrations by Mr.

Hugh Thomson, and serviceable ones by Mr. Finch Mason.

There are poets whose poem-titles are better than the poems themselves, and such a one is Mr. John Ottwell. To begin with, he calls his book Short Poems (Kegan Paul). That is promising; we like short poems. Then he has a section called epigrams. That is promising; we like epigrams. And among the poems is one called "The Old Book-lover's Farewell to his Book." That is promising; we like old book-lovers. But the results are less satisfactory. The short poems are only short; the epigrams are not very epigrammatic; and the "Farewell" is verbose and not really bookish. Here is one of the "epigrams":

A DEFINITION OF A BORE.

Of dulness vast, and wisdom small (His conversation shows it!),
A bore is one who tires us all,
And never, never knows it!

Here is another:

THE FATE OF THE EPICS.

Wouldst thou an epic poet be,
And proudly stand in fame alone?
Methinks thy final fate I see:
Admired by all, and read by none!

"Admired by all" is questionable.

THEOLOGY.

The authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews has been a matter of dispute from the earliest ages, and it is not probable that the question will ever be set at rest. The boldness and spiritual science that characterise the document have alone been sufficient to win for it its place in the Canon; and the difficulty of its complete interpretation has made it the centre of infinite conflict. Mr. George Milligan, a Scots Presbyterian minister, in the book that lies before us—The Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews (T. & T. Clark)—has endeavoured to present a general view of its teaching based on the results of modern criticism. It were impossible to attempt in these lines to pronounce upon the result of what may be called the conscientious work of two lifetimes—for the exposition is based upon notes by the author's father; but we cannot help thinking that Barnabas, or Clement of Rome, or Apollos, or whoever was the writer, would have been surprised, and that Arius, that eminent dissenter, would have had no scruple about approving
Mr. Milligan's notion of the Divine Sonship.

In The Angels of God (Skeffington), Mr. J. B. Johnson, a clergyman of that section of the Church of England which is said to be Catholic but not Roman, sets himself to revive a devotion which would appear to have gone out of fashion.
Mr. Johnson is reverently ingenious in his speculations; and for those to whom the precise distinction between a Power and a Throne is not familiar, or who are troubled with scruples as to whether they may or should intercede with the Divine clemency on behalf of the rebellious Seraphs, this little book will serve as a sufficient and orthodox guide. As a subject of special study the Nine Orders are certainly interesting.

Dr. Forrest's earnest and suggestive course of Kerr Lectures for 1897, on The Christ of History and of Experience, has reached a second edition. So much of the theological literature of our time is directed to the discussion of points of external discipline and order, so much, again, is mere Sunday afternoon sentiment, that clear, bold thought about the deepest truths and fallacies is very welcome. The Scots divine, of the best kind, seems to have inherited something of the courageous diligence of the mediæval schoolman.

WAR.

Mr. Vassili Verestchagin, whose pictures of Napoleon's campaign in Russia may now be seen at the Grafton Galleries, has brought his pen to bear on the same subject. The book, in translation, has been published by Mr. Heinemann under the title 1812: Napoleon I. in Russia. Mr. Verestchagin's brush does its grim work with sufficient fidelity; but some of the horrors narrated in his book exceed those of his pictures. The author has gone to many sources for his facts, and this record of the fiasco loses nothing of force from the circumstance that the historian is a Russian. Mr. Verestchagin's pages may lack form, but they are full of interest. Mr. Whiteing contributes an introduction, which is mainly an account of the artist.

To the "Wolseley" series Messrs. Kegan Paul have just added The Conduct of War, a translation by Major Levenson from the German of Lieut.-General von der Goltz, of the Ottoman Army. The translator has done his work with unusual skill. In its English form the book is lucid and progressive as a stream.

MISCELLANEOUS.

If a worse title than Bottled Holidays for Home Consumption could be found, we hope we shall never hear of it. Such is the name of a new and copious work of humour by Mr. Martin Cobbett which Messrs. Sands have just published. It is the humour of Saturday afternoons. The author would "vote for an Act to abolish all boys"; an inn is a "pub"; and the first pipe and the strength of peppermint drops are described with the necessary minuteness of the pitiless funny man who refuses to remember that such things have always been done before. When keeping to accounts of what he has seen, and quotations of curious passages that he has read, Mr. Cobbett is a tolerable companion; but his reflections on life!

It is twenty-six years since the Englishwoman's Year Book and Directory (Black) began its career under Miss Louisa M. Hubbard. Various titles and enlargements have marked its progress, and now Miss Hubbard has relinquished her task owing to failing health. Her successor is Miss Emily Jones, whose work in "Woman movements" is well known. Miss Jones begins her work with an appropriate amount of bustle. Most of her Preface, she will forgive us for saying, would be effective as a speech.

Two recent newspaper correspondences have just appeared in book form: Sir William Harcourt's letters to the Times on Ritualism, entitled Lawlessness in the National Church (Macmillan), and the Daily News series of special articles on The Children's Labour Question (Daily News Office).

The latest volume in Messrs. Newnes's "Library of Useful Stories" is an introduction to psychology under the title of The Story of the Mind. The author, Prof. James Mark Baldwin, has had almost the most difficult task of any contributor to this informing series, but he has come through it triumphantly. Mr. Dent is adding Plutarch's Lives to the Temple Classics. There will be ten volumes in all, of which the first two are now ready.

We have received from Messrs. Longmans the Charities Register and Digest for 1899. This work was formerly published about every four years, but is now an annual. As far as possible all fraudulent institutions and societies have been excluded from the Register.

Fiction.

Red Rock. By Thomas Nelson Page.
(William Heinemann.)

NOT only as to subject, but also as to treatment, Mr. Page's novel belongs to the period of the American Civil War. If one may say so with propriety of an American, Mr. Page is mid-Victorian. He is all for the things that have passed, that are passing, away. In his preface he compares unfavourably the humanity of to-day with that of yesterday; and in his last chapter he interrupts the story in order to impress on the reader that this novel is not as other modern novels. It is not. It belongs to a convention which flourished before the rank and file of literary artists had discovered that life itself, with all its incredible shortcomings, was a theme grand enough and lofty enough for the most inspired. The workers in that convention lacked either the faith or the courage to look on life itself. And instead, they looked within, and seeing there a world which they preferred to the actual, painted that. They have their reward according to their accomplishment. This convention is a perfectly justifiable one; it has produced some novels indubitably great; and we respect it.

Red Rock is not great, but it is, once you will give up trying to relate it to life, delicately fine. It is the expression of a gracious, benevolent and high-minded individuality. It has the sweet charm of "the old school," the dignity, the rare manners—and withal the steely prejudices. And, of course, it exhibits the characteristics of its period. The persons of the drama are divided into good and bad. The bad men—his animus against whom the author never attempts to conceal—are consistently bad; the good men may have their weak moments, but there is one sin they must never be guilty of—meanness. There are no bad women; of the good women it is required that they be "womanly," and "womanly" they are under the most trying circumstances—even when proposing to a man:

"There is no way to help me . . ."

"There is one way," she said.

"And that is?"

"To marry me. . . . If you marry me I could not be made to testify against you . . ."

"I could not allow you to sacrifice yourself . . ."

"It would not be—Yes, you can," she pleaded.

"No," said Steve, almost sternly. "Do not, I beg you." He lifted his hand as though to put her from him; but suddenly clutched at his heart . . .

"Go," he said. "Leave me, please. . . ."

She turned without a word, and moved slowly toward the door. As she put out her hand to open it, she suddenly sank in a heap on the floor. In a second Steve was at her side. . . .

"Ruth," he said; and, as she opened her eyes, "forgive me." He caught the hem of her dress and crushed it against his lips. ". . . I could not let you sacrifice yourself."

"It is no sacrifice. Do you not see? Oh! Can you not see that—I—love?" . . . Her head drooped.

"What! Ruth!" Steve stood her up on her feet and held her at arm's length. "Ruth Welch, for God's sake, do not tell me that unless it's true." His eyes were burning, and were fastened on her face with a gaze that seemed almost to scorch her.

"It is true," she said in a low voice, and tried to turn her face away. . . .

"Wait," he said hoarsely. "Does your mother know of this?"

"Yes." She was looking in his eyes now quite calmly.

The United States is said to be a peculiarly sentimental nation, and such books as this go to support the assertion. Sentimentality permeates Red Rock through and through—the episodes of childhood, the pranks of youth, the battles, the death-beds, the secret machinations, the false accusations, the braveries, the cowardices, all are sentimentalised to the very limit of absorption. The sentimentality is not mawkish, nor feeble, nor noxious; but it is—sentimentality.

Some may think that we have not enjoyed this novel. But we have. In common with all works of art, it demands a certain surrender. Once that is made, none could fail to enjoy it. For it is honest, loving, and capable; it is even strong; and it has the faint, wistful charm of an antique time.

The Countess Tekla. By Robert Barr.
(Methuen.)

MEDIEVAL Trèves, the Moselle, a disguised emperor, a military archbishop, a black count, an English archer who could shoot herons on the wing by night, sundry castles, and the most beautiful woman in the world—such are the chief materials out of which Mr. Robert Barr has constructed The Countess Tekla. The theme of the story is the wooing by the Emperor (disguised as plain Lord Rodolph) of the Countess, who is feudal ward of the Archbishop, and destined by that implacable person to be the wife of a dire villain. Rodolph duly wins the Countess, and then comes the inevitable scene of identification:

His Majesty had eyes for none but the Countess Tekla, who appeared, indeed, a queen in the stately robes that became her so well. Rodolph seemed suddenly stricken dumb by her beauty, for all the colour had fled from her face, leaving it like chiselled marble, as she stood demurely with her eyes bent on the ground.

"Tekla," he murmured, taking her hand with deep reverence, and raising it to his lips, "is the Prince who returns as welcome as the unknown lord would have been?"

"Yes—your Majesty," whispered Tekla, casting a swift glance at him, the colour again touching her cheeks.

"And is Countess Tekla willing to become Empress Tekla?"

"The delight of a loyal subject is to obey the imperial command," she said, a smile coming at last to her lips.

Again the Emperor raised her hand and kissed it.

This passage is a fair specimen of the style of the book, and it will be observed that it has neither much originality nor much freshness. The Countess Tekla is just a favourable specimen of the modern historical novel, with some novelty of scene and colour, and perhaps a more symmetrical construction than is usual. It exists for its excitations, and one may admit that these are good.

We prefer the author of A Woman Intervenes to the author of The Countess Tekla. No one would suspect from the latter that Mr. Robert Barr possesses an individual and very genuine humour. Yet such is the fact, and we like him best when, instead of hiding his gifts, he uses and profits by them.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

A BRIDE OF GOD.

BY CONRAD H. CARRODER.

A work of saccharine sentimentality, wherein we seem to see the influence of the author of The Christian. Religion plays a too prominent part. On the last page a young couple decide to refer always to their deceased infant as Jesus. (F. V. White. 6s.)

ANEROESTES THE GAUL.

BY E. M. SMITH.

If anyone requires a story of the Second Punic War, here it is. Says Aneroestes: "I was a captive, but I won my liberty by fighting an Allobrogian giant for the amusement of the soldiers. He thought to be victorious, for I was lame and unfitted for such a struggle. I bear the mark of his sword across my forehead, and he bit away part of my ear, but he could not overcome me. Still, he fought well. I wounded him in the side with my sword, but I killed him with my hands. It was a great struggle, but Hannibal gave me my liberty, with costly presents and a horse of good blood." Hannibal figures in the romance, which is gory. The escape of Aneroestes at the end is very consoling. (Unwin. 6s.)

CARR OF DIMS CAUR.

BY THEO. DOUGLAS.

Here, by the author of Windygap, is real melodrama again. In the beginning we are met by a will with extraordinary provisions, one being that not till the stroke of twelve twenty-one years hence may the inheritor call the property his own. To reach the page when the clock strikes is, therefore, the goal of every reader's desire. That page is 280, and the inheritor is on his death-bed. We will not reveal secrets, but it may be said that a miser's hoard, an attempted murder, a mad butler, and a new kind of ghost are all in the story. (Harpers. 6s.)

THE LIBRETTO.

BY RUDOLF DIRCKS.

A clever, nervously-written story of more or less Bohemian life. The hero is a composer, and at thirty-one decides to abandon his fruitless striving for success and marry an heiress. The new quest leads to the success which he had sought in the old. There is a good deal of writing of this kind: "He danced with a series of well-equipped women, with coiffures, a miracle of arrangement, just under his nose. He scarcely attempted to speak to those partners, and he could never afterwards, by any effort of memory, recall who they were or what they were like." (Sands. 3s. 6d.)

AN ANGEL IN A WEB.

BY JULIAN RALPH.

The first chapter of this novel will repel some readers and attract others by the fact that it introduces spirits or "Etherians" among the characters. Colonel Lamont is dying, and the house is full of his dead relatives, "long since rubbed off the slate of earthly reckoning." These take the form of puffs of luminous vapour. The butler, Tappin, is piquantly blind to their presence. A queer novel. (Harper & Brothers. 6s.)

LIFE'S PEEPSHOW.

BY H. R. RUSSELL.

Six short stories well written and observed, but usually rather inconclusive, in Mark Rutherford's region of subjects. (Unwin. 6s.)

SIX QUEER TALES.

BY NEMO.

Six queer tales by Nemo. (Morison. 6d.)

R. L. Stevenson Again.

II.—As Reviewer for "The Academy."

BETWEEN 1874 and 1878 Stevenson contributed many articles to THE ACADEMY. This illuminative paper on Edgar Allan Poe, which, we are sure, many will like to read again, was printed in THE ACADEMY issue for January 2, 1875, about the time that the later of the letters in the current Scribner's Magazine were written:

When all is said, it is not in the power of man to make Poe altogether sympathetic. I cannot find it in my heart to like either his portrait or his character; and though it is possible that we see him more or less refracted through the strange medium of his works, yet I do fancy that we can detect, alike in these, in his portrait, and in the facts of his life as now most favourably told, a certain jarring note, a taint of something that we do not care to dwell upon or find a name for. . . .

I fancy we shall not be mistaken in regarding some of the last stories in the second volume as being also among the last he wrote. There is no trace in these of the brilliant and often solid workmanship of his better moments. The stories are ill-conceived and written carelessly. There is much laughter, but it is a very ghastly sort of laughter at best—the laughter of those, in his own words, "who laugh, but smile no more." He seems to have lost respect for himself, for his art, and for his audience. When he dealt before with horrible images, he dealt with them for some definite enough creative purpose, and with a certain measure and gravity suitable to the occasion; but he scatters them abroad in these last tales with an indescribable and sickening levity, with something of the ghoul or the furious lunatic that surpasses what one had imagined to oneself of hell. There is a duty to the living more important than any charity to the dead; and it would be criminal in the reviewer to spare one harsh word in the expression of his own loathing and horror lest by its absence another victim should be permitted to soil himself with the perusal of the infamous "King Pest." He who could write "King Pest" had ceased to be a human being. For his own sake, and out of an infinite compassion for so lost a spirit, one is glad to think of him as dead. . . .

It is not the fashion of Poe's earlier tales to be pointless, however it may be with these sorry ones of the end. Pointlessness is, indeed, the very last charge that could be brought reasonably against them. He has the true storyteller's instinct. He knows the little nothings that make stories or mar them. He knows how to enhance the significance of any situation, and give colour and life with seemingly irrelevant particulars. Thus, the whole spirit of "The Cask of Amontillado" depends on Fortunato's carnival costume of cap and bells and motley. When Poe had once hit upon this device of dressing the victim grotesquely, he had found the key of the story; and so he sends him with uneven steps along the catacombs of the Montressors, and the last sound we hear out of the walled-up recess is the jingling of the bells upon his cap. Admirable, also, is the use he makes of the striking clock at Prince Prospero's feast, in "The Mask of the Red Death." Each time the clock struck (the reader will remember) it struck so loudly that the music and the dancing must cease perforce until it had made an end. As the hours ran on towards midnight these pauses grew naturally longer; the maskers had the more time to think and look at one another, and their thoughts were none the more pleasant. Thus, as each hour struck there went a jar about the assemblage, until, as the reader will remember, the end comes suddenly. Now, this is quite legitimate; no one need be ashamed of being frightened or excited by such means; the rules of the game have been respected, only, by the true instinct of the story-teller, he has told his story to the best advantage, and got full value for his imaginations. This is not so always, however, for sometimes he will take a high note falsetto; sometimes, by a sort of conjuring trick, get more out of his story than he has been able to put into it; and, while the whole garrison is really parading past us on the esplanade, continue to terrify us from the battlements with sham cannon and many fierce-looking shakos upon broomsticks. For example, in "The Pit and the Pendulum," after having exhausted his bedevilled imagination in the conception of the pendulum and the red-hot collapsing walls, he finds he can figure forth nothing more horrible for the pit, and yet the pit was to be the crowning horror. This is how he effects his purpose:

Amid the thought of the fiery destruction that impended, the idea of the coolness of the well came over my soul like balm. I rushed to its deadly brink. I threw my straining vision below. The glare from the enkindled roof illumined its inmost recesses. Yet for a wild moment did my spirit refuse to comprehend the meaning of what I saw. At length it forced—it wrestled its way into my soul—it burned itself in upon my shuddering reason. O for a voice to speak! Oh, horror! Oh, any horror but this!

And that is all. He knows no more about the pit than you or I do. It is a pure imposture, a piece of audacious, impudent thimble-rigging; and yet, even with such bugs as these he does manage to frighten us. You will find the same artifice repeated in "Hans Pfaal," about the mysteries of the moon; and again, though with a difference, in the abrupt conclusion of "Arthur Gordon Pym." His imagination is a willing horse; but, as you see, he has killed it under him by over-riding, and come limping to the post on foot. With what a good grace does he not turn these failures to advantage, and make capital out of each imaginative bankruptcy! Even on a critical retrospect, it is hard to condemn him as he deserves; for he cheats with gusto.

After this knowledge of the stage, this cleverness at turning a story out, perhaps the most striking of Poe's peculiarities is an almost incredible insight into the debatable region between sanity and madness. The "Imp of the Perverse," for example, is an important contribution to morbid psychology; so, perhaps, is "The Man of the Crowd"; "Berenice," too, for, as horrible as it is, it touches a chord in one's own breast, though perhaps it is a chord that had better be left alone; and the same idea recurs in "The Tell-Tale Heart." Sometimes we can go with him the whole way with a good conscience; sometimes—instead of saying, Yes, this is how I should be if I were just a little more mad than ever I was—we can say frankly, This is what I am. There is one passage of analysis in this more normal vein in the story of "Ligeia," as to the expression of Ligeia's eyes. He tells us how he felt ever on the point of understanding their strange quality, and ever baffled at the last moment, just as "in our endeavours to recall the memory of something long forgotten, we often find ourselves upon the very verge of remembrance without being able in the end to remember"; and how, in streams of running water, in the ocean, in the falling of a meteor, in the glances of unusually aged people, in certain sounds from stringed instruments, in certain passages from books, in the commonest sights and sensations of the universe, he found ever and anon some vague, inexplicable analogy to the expression and the power of these loved eyes. "This, at least, or the like of it, we all know. But, in the general, his subtlety was more of a snare to him than anything else. "Nil sapientiae odiosius," he quotes himself from Seneca, "nil sapientiae odiosius acumine nimio." And though it is delightful enough in the C. Auguste Dupin trilogy—it was Baudelaire who called it a trilogy—yet one wearies in the long run of this strain of ingenuity; one begins to marvel at the absence of the good homespun motives and sentiments that do the business of the everyday world; although the demonstration is clever, and the case instructive and probably unique, one begins to weary of going round this madhouse, and long for the society of some plain, harmless person, with business habits and a frock coat, and nerves not much more shattered than the majority of his plain and harmless contemporaries. Nor did this exaggerated insight make him wearisome only; it did worse than that—it sometimes led him astray. Thus, in "The Pit and the Pendulum," when the hero has been condemned, "the sound of the inquisitorial voices," he says, "seemed merged in one dreary indeterminate hum. It conveyed to my soul the idea of revolution, perhaps from its association in fancy with the burr of a mill-wheel." Now, it wants but a moment's reflection to prove how much too clever Poe has been here, how far from true reason he has been carried by this minium acumen. For—the man being giddy—the "idea of revolution"—must have preceded the merging of the inquisitorial voices into an indeterminate hum, and most certainly could not have followed it as any fanciful deduction. Again, as before in the matter of effect, one cannot help fearing that some of the subtlety is fustian. To take an example of both sorts of imagination—the fustian and the sincere—from the same story "Arthur Gordon Pym"; the four survivors on board the brig Grampus have lashed themselves to the windlass, lest they should be swept away; one of them having drawn his lashings too tight, is ready to yield up his spirit for a long while, is nearly cut in two, indeed, by the cord about his loins. "No sooner had we removed it, however," Poe goes on, "than he spoke and seemed to experience instant relief—being able to move with much greater ease than either Parker or myself" (two who had not tied themselves so closely). "This was no doubt owing to the loss of blood." Now, whether medically correct or not, this is, on the face of it, sincerely imagined. Whether correct or not in fact, it is correct in art. Poe evidently believed it true; evidently it appeared to him that thus, and not otherwise, the thing would fall out. Now, turn a page back, and we shall find in the description of the visions that went before Pym while thus bound, something to be received very much more deliberately:

I now remember, he writes, that in all which passed before my mind's eye, motion has a predominant idea. Thus I never fancied any stationary object, such as a house, a mountain, or anything of that kind; but windmills, ships, large birds, balloons, people on horseback, carriages driving furiously, and similar moving objects presented themselves in endless succession.

This may be true; it may be the result of great erudition in the thoughts of people in such sore straits; but the imagination does not adopt these details; they do not commend themselves to our acceptance, it is nowise apparent why stationary objects should not present themselves to the fancy of a man tied to the windlass of a dismasted brig; and this being so, the whole passage, as art, stands condemned. If it be mere causeless fancy (as it seems), it is fustian of the most unpardonable sort; if it be erudition—well, then, it may be erudition, but never art. Things are fit for art so far only as they are true and apparent. To make what I mean clear: Mr. Ruskin, in some one or other of his delightful books, quotes and approves a poet (I think it was Homer) who said of a brave man that he was as brave as a fly; and proceeds in his usual happy manner to justify the epithet. The fly, he tells us, is in very deed the most madly courageous of all created beings. And therefore the simile is good—excellent good. And yet the reader's instinct would tell him, I am sure, that the simile was a vile simile. Let him prefer his instinct before Mr. Ruskin's natural history. For, though it be based on what is true, this comparison is not based upon a truth that is apparent; it does not commend itself to our acceptance; it is not art.

I have spoken at so great a length of these matters of method and detail, that no room remains to me to speak of the larger question—a question also avoided by Baudelaire on the same plea of want of space—why is it that these subjects interested Poe's imagination—a question difficult of solution, indeed, but not insoluble with time. Nor have I left myself room to speak of what is perhaps still more important, the relation between Poe and his far greater and better compatriot, Hawthorne. That there is a consanguinity, that the two saw the world in a fashion not altogether dissimilar, that some of the short stories of Hawthorne seem inspired by Poe, and some of Poe's short stories seem to be an echo of Hawthorne—all this is beyond question; but all this I can do no more than indicate.

Nor should the reader be surprised if a criticism upon Poe is mostly negative, and rather suggests new doubts than resolves those already existing; for it is Poe's merit to carry people away, and it is his besetting sin that he wants altogether such scrupulous honesty as guides and restrains the finished artist. He was, let us say it with all sorrow, not conscientious. Hunger was ever at his door, and he had too imperious a desire for what we call nowadays the sensational in literature; and thus the critic (if he be more conscientious than the man he is criticising) dare not greatly praise lest he should be thought to condone all that is unscrupulous and tinsel in these wonderful stories. They are to be praised by him in one way only—by recommending those that are least objectionable. If anyone wishes to be excited, let him read under favourable circumstances "The Gold Bug," "The Descent into the Maelström," "The Cask of Amontillado," and "The Oval Portrait." If he should then desire to read more, he may go on, but warily; there are trap-doors and spring guns in these two volumes, there are gins and pitfalls; and the precipitate reader may stumble unawares upon some nightmare not easily to be forgotten.

R. L. STEVENSON.

Things Seen.

The Red Runner.

IN holiday-time there was one hour that I made my own—the last hour of daylight—the hour when the runners practised. All day long, through lesson-time, through play-time, the idea lurked in my mind that behind the high wall at the foot of our garden lay the running-ground, with the black half-mile cinder-track skirting the great field. And all day long, through lesson-time, through playtime, I looked forward to that twilight hour, that was my own. For then, with the help of the garden roller, I could swing myself into the mulberry-tree that swayed and rustled over the cinder-track. There, in that hour that was my own, I would sit to watch the runners practise—dream runners, for I never saw them close—dream runners, those swift, lithe, white figures who swept round the bend of the ground and struggled neck-and-neck to their goal. One was not better than the other. They reached the tape so nearly together, that a foot would have covered them. They symbolised the crowd—the world's crowd—those mediocre, eager runners. But on certain evenings all that was changed. They did not begin so readily. They did not skip over to the starting-place, with knees leaping to chins, and heels arched from the ground: they waited around the dressing-room, clad in long ulsters, till he came out—he, the Champion. And he was always clothed in red. Across the dim grass they followed him to the starting-place. And when they ran the course the issue was always the same. Always, always, he breasted the tape a dozen yards in front of the white runners. Then he would start behind them—some way—but when they came into the straight this Red Champion would shoot through the rest and fly victoriously to the tape. He was always first—this wonderful runner who dressed himself in red. I never knew his name; I never saw him, save across the dim grass in the hour that was my own; but the vision clings. For me Red must always be the colour of perfection, the symbol of excellence. When I hear of splendid gifts come to fruition, of men greatly excelling, I see again that Red Champion outpacing all others in the hour that was my own.

Sentiment.

SUDDENLY I was aware of a shouting. Then a boy spun round the corner and came towards me, running.

"Stop him!" cried his pursuer, a man in an apron.

With the instinct of a Rugby footballer I dropped my eyes to the point of contact, and made ready to collar.

"Orf-side," panted the boy.

I could not help looking up and catching his eye. He was winded, but smiling.

"Don't you, guv'nor," he panted, as he passed. And I didn't.

"Why didn't you stop him?" puffed the man in the apron as he pounded by me.

Well—I played the game.

Dr. Garnett's Retirement.

A Chat in the British Museum.

IN another column we announce the approaching retirement of Dr. Richard Garnett from the post of Keeper of the Printed Books at the British Museum. A representative of the ACADEMY, who sought a few minutes' interview with Dr. Garnett, writes as follows:

My progress to Dr. Garnett's room in the British Museum filled me with awe: it was such a succession of silences and shades. First, the quiet courtyard, with its was sixteen, an age impossible in a beginner now. In those days the Museum was worked under its own rules; but it has since come under Civil Service regulations."

It is under those regulations that, in ordinary course, Dr. Garnett would retire about a year hence. His anticipation of that date is due to domestic circumstances.

"Will you tell me," I said, "a few of the changes and events which have marked your superintendence of the Reading Room and of the Library as a whole?"

"Well, I may say as regards the Reading Room that while I was there we greatly reduced the average length of time occupied in procuring books for readers. In the pigeons; then the vestibule, where I lost the support of my umbrella; then the Grenville Library, with its letters and manuscripts; then the King's Library, that aisle of learnings, so quiet, straight, and long. In the east wall of the King's Library there is an insignificant button. I was bidden to press it. Instantly shelves loaded with counterfeit books fell back, and a voice said cheerily: "Come in." Inviting me into his comfortable room, Dr. Garnett told me that his connection with the British Museum Library had lasted forty-eight years. Throughout all that period his occupations have lain in the department of which he is now the head.

"I entered the Library," said Dr. Garnett, "when I old days that time was much longer than it is now, and complaints were numerous." It was naturally not of the Reading Room that Dr. Garnett preferred to talk, its management being now in other and capable hands.

Replying to the second part of my question, Dr. Garnett informed me that during his Keepership an unusually large number of Early English books have been added to the collection. "Probably not in the forty previous years had so many rare books of this class been placed in the Library. During my term of office we have secured five new Caxtons. Five may seem a small number, but you must remember that I mean five Caxtons which the Museum did not already possess. The libraries of Sir Charles Isham and Mr. Maurice Johnson have yielded us many fine Early English works. They could have yielded more; but our grant for the purchase of new books is only £9,000 annually. I journeyed to Paris in 1892 to attend the sale of the Heredia Library, and the result was an important enrichment of our Spanish section of books. Another event—one of many which I might name—was the munificent gift to the Museum of the Tapling collection of postage stamps in 1892. This collection is valued at something like fifty thousand pounds, and it was most acceptable."

Dr. Garnett expressed the regret he feels at severing his connexion with the British Museum. A regret no less sincere will be felt by every student using the Library.

Memoirs of the Moment.

"O THAT mine enemy had written a book!" Perhaps it is partly due to Job's rather cryptic exclamation that some authors whose books are badly noticed get a painful suspicion that personal hostility has put gall into the ink of the reviewer. The experience of Mr. Pym Yeatman ought to put such suspicions on their guard. He, a barrister, has gone through years of his life with the impression that a clique of barristers has been upon his heels, and would not let him alone even when he left off drawing pleas and took to the trade of author. So when the Saturday Review said some hard things about his book, The Gentle Shakspere, he knew that once more the enemy was at the gate; and after nursing his injury for two years, till it had grown to be a most rampagious child, he took it into court and presented it to the arms of a British jury. The suit was against the editor, the printer, the publisher; for you cannot get at the reviewer, said Mr. Yeatman: these "assassins stab in the dark." But the reviewer, as it happened, was called; and when he entered the box, lo, and behold, it was Mr. Churton Collins—no barrister at all, but an expert to whom the book went in the ordinary course of, in that respect, very excellently conducted business. As to the words of the review, sweepingly condemnatory as they were, the jury refused to consider the question at issue between the author and the reviewer, merely contenting themselves with deciding that, whether Mr. Churton Collins was right or wrong, sectarian or unsectarian, he honestly held his views, and had a full right to express them.

In a different category stood the Saturday Review's own comment on a letter from Mr. Pym Yeatman complaining of Mr. Churton Collins's review. Its first impulse, the paper said, was to send him a five-pound note. That phrase, if rumours from the jury-room are true, nearly won Mr. Pym Yeatman his suit, for the impoliteness was felt to be one personal to the plaintiff; and, but for the Lord Chief Justice's own condemnation of it, in his effective summing-up, as a "vulgarity," some members of the jury would have found a difficulty in letting it pass. Yet a victory for the plaintiff on that particular would have confused the main issue, which turned on the review by Mr. Churton Collins.

SIR WILLIAM GRAY has died leaving an estate valued at a million and a half for probate duty; and the Duke of Northumberland an estate valued at about half that sum. The inference might be that in these difficult days for magnates of the soil the Durham shipbuilder was twice as rich a man as the Duke of the neighbouring county of Northumberland. But that inference would be wrong. The late Duke in his own lifetime made over to his son a great portion of his estates, with the result that no death duties are payable—the only duties, some one has wittily said, that are really brought home to owners of land.

MR. DILLON has left the leadership of the Irish Party—a post which is great or little according to the man who holds it. That was a remark made by Lord Lytton of the Military Secretaryship to the Viceroy of India when he offered it to poor Pomeroy Colley; and it applies to most offices in the world, perhaps to all. Whether there is now a man in the Irish ranks who can reclaim for the leadership of "the Irish race at home and abroad" the prestige (to use a word detested of Mr. Gladstone) with which Parnell invested it may be doubted. No attempt will be made at present in any such direction. A member who has the negative advantage of not possessing strong personal opponents in any section of the Party is the man on whom the mantle of Mr. Dillon is about to fall; and such a man the Party is likely to find in Sir Thomas Gratton Esmonde.

FOR the crime of marrying Robert Browning (oh, the irony of it to-day!) Elizabeth Barrett's father never forgave her. She herself had three or four hundred a year, and Browning had nothing; but it was not his poverty alone that barred the way, it was Mr. Barrett's hatred of marriage for his daughter at all. She would not tell even her devoted sisters of her engagement, so as to spare them his wrath. They knew of Browning's visits, and might guess as they liked, but their sister was a married woman, with her ring in her pocket, and they were told nothing. One of them had given up her own love affair:

I look back shuddering [writes Elizabeth] to the dreadful scenes in which poor Henrietta was involved who never offended as I have offended. . . . years ago. . . . At a word she gave up all—at a word. . . . A child never submitted more meekly to a revoked holiday. Yet how she was made to suffer. Oh the dreadful scenes! and only because she had seemed to feel a little. . . . I hear how her knees were made to ring upon the floor now! She was carried out of the room in strong hysterics, and I, who rose up to follow her, though I was quite well at the time, and suffered only by sympathy, fell flat down upon my face in a fainting fit. Arabel thought I was dead.

Elizabeth Barrett thought that to marry and then beg pardon would be better than to announce the intention and then obstinately and defiantly, as it might seem, to marry under an explicit prohibition. It appeared more pardonable to disobey the implicit injunction, "You shall not marry," than the explicit command, "You shall not marry Robert Browning." We know that she could hardly have done worse in her father's eyes than what she did; but then we know what, happily, she did not—that he would never forgive her, never see her, never open a letter from her; that when she wrote to tell him that she—the fragile invalid—was to bear a child, and, thinking she might die, once more implored him to forgive her, the seal of that letter was never broken until, after his death, the writer, weeping, found it in his desk.

THE Woman Movement of our time is but the successor of the Woman Question of the forties. The “advanced” of to-day is the daughter of the “strong-minded” of half a century ago; and in those days Miss Martineau mooted the proposal as to female Members of Parliament—a more audacious proposal than that which has been so long and so often showing a somewhat disconcerted face to the Legislature as it still is. The strong-minded woman was more rhetorical than the advanced; she had not assumed any of the responsible tasks she achieves now in the factory, the School Board, and the parish; but she wrote with the utmost solemnity, and doubtless her platitudes had their influence, even though Westminster still stands where it is. What recalls this old form of the contention is the record (in these Browning Letters) of Robert Browning’s surprising reasons for discountenancing the aspirations of women towards Parliament. He must have been profoundly possessed by a conviction of the genius of the woman he was addressing when he wrote:

How essentially retrograde a measure! Parliament seems no place for originating, creative minds—but for second-rate minds influenced by and bent on working out the results of these; and the most efficient qualities for such a purpose are confessedly found oftener with men than with women—physical power having a great deal to do with it beside. . . . There is such a thing as influencing the influencers, playing the Bentham to the Cobden, the Barry to a Commission for Public Works, the Lough [the sculptor] to the three or four industrious men with square paper caps who get rules and plummets and dot the blocks of marble all over as his drawings indicate.

Of all reasons for advising women to remain in the background this is assuredly unique in its generosity.

MR. RHODES has come from Chicago as a visitor—and a very welcome one—to London, where he is likely to stay for a year. Mr. Rhodes was the editor of the Chap-book, and, of course, he was known among his intimates at Chicago as the Book Chap.

THE Lord Chief Justice is going to present to the House of Lords a little Bill directed against the receivers of secret commissions and illicit tips. Some nicety of language will, no doubt, be required, and will equally, no doubt, be forthcoming, to distinguish between “tips” that are bribes and tips that are genuine gratuities. So far as the household is concerned, the Lord Chief Justice has had a fore-runner in this attempt at reform. The Prince of Wales did not attempt to legislate; but, more than thirty years ago, he issued a circular on the subject which is now among the rarer documents of its day. Speaking in 1865 of his own household, the Prince said:

Concluding that every tradesman will lend a hand in putting down such a practice—equally prejudicial to the interest of his employer as himself—he has directed to discharge from his service every servant who may receive, and to cease employing every tradesman who may pay, such a percentage; or who may make a present of any kind in consideration of His Royal Highness’s custom.

THE “Leighton Bequest,” as Lord Leighton’s gift of £10,000 to the Royal Academy will be called, was made under conditions the most pathetic. To some people its very existence has come lately as a revelation; and their surprise is easily explained. For the bequest was not mentioned in Lord Leighton’s will, by which all his property went to his two sisters. But on his death-bed he made known various wishes by word of mouth, of which this was one: “Give my dear Academy ten thousand pounds.” He added words showing that he was under some illusion as to a large balance at his bankers, a balance which turned out to be much smaller than he at that moment of fever seemed to suppose. Hence the subsequent sale of his household, and even personal, possessions—a policy which met with some idle challenge at the time, but which was adopted by his devoted sisters, determined scrupulously to give effect to their brother’s verbal and death-bed devisings.

Correspondence

Mr. Lang is not Amused.

SIR,—Perhaps I should explain that I read the rhymes on Poe, attributed to Mr. Dobson, without recognising them as my own. They may be mine. If so, I certainly forgot their existence and never intended them for publication. Nor can I understand why such trivialities are printed and discussed by rational beings. I am not “amused” by any incident which might conceivably annoy Mr. Dobson.—I am, &c.,

A. LANG.

St. Andrews: Feb. 1, 1899.

Green’s “Short History.”

SIR,—“S. W. S.” has probably used an early edition of Green, for the quotation from Psalm lxxviii. at sun-break over Dunbar is given thus in the 1878 edition, ch. ix., p. 559: “Let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered! Like as the mist vanisheth, so shalt thou drive them away!” This corrects the figure, but, as will be seen, omits the second clause of verse 1 (“Let them also that hate Him flee before Him”), and does not agree literally either with the Authorised or Prayer Book version. “Mist” is excellent, no doubt; but “smoke” fits more closely to the Hebrew. Where did Green get his version? Carlyle’s Cromwell (Vol. II., pp. 185-6) does not give the mist clause at all, and suggests yet another and most interesting variant—that in Rous’s metre, as below:

Let God arise, and scattered

Let all His enemies be;

And let all those that do Him hate

Before His presence flee!

which is still in use in the Psalms of David in metre: “according to the version approved by the Church of Scotland.” Yet—what were Cromwell’s actual words?—I am, &c.,

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 19.

NOVELISTS in search of names for their characters should apply to us, for in reply to our request last week for practical styles for (1) an ordinarily interesting hero, (2) a beautiful, but not remarkable, heroine, (3) a parson troubled with religious doubt, (4) a typical squire, (5) a whimsical maiden aunt, and (6) an effeminate artist, some hundreds of names have been sent in. To decide on the best list has been no easy matter; but the following, we think, has most claims to the prize, and a cheque has, therefore, been posted to Janet B. Newman, 23, St. Paul's square, York, the author of this selection:

- (1) Allan Northcote.
- (2) Norah Balgarnie.
- (3) The Rev. Stephen Sinclair.
- (4) Roger Grey (of Greylands).
- (5) Miss Bettine Cretchett (commonly called Annt Cretchett).
- (6) Cyril Willowes.

The list might be better; but Miss Newman has resisted the temptation—which has been too much for most competitors—to make it farcical. We intended the names to be such as a serious novelist might transfer at once to his story; but for the most part we have received names far more suitable for the comic stage.

We give a selection of alternative names for each character:

For the ordinarily interesting hero: Gilbert Joynson, Harold Wynne, Henry Vereker, Jack Bennington, Richard Kingsley, Vincent Fareboy, Lawrence Baldwyn, Courage Brassbold, Guy Rollo, Darall Ryde, Lancelot Riley, Marsh Rentwood, Kenneth Ogilvy.

For the beautiful, but not remarkable, heroine: Eunice Leighton, Alys Fanshaw, Vera Marsden, Celia Davenport, Marion Beauvisage, Constance Cheverton, Sybil Minton, Barbara Meadows, Pamela Moore, Ida Melville, Violet Trelawny, Fortuna Blake, Eva Carbonell, Clara Dorrien, Lily Lovelace.

For the parson troubled with religious doubt: Rev. Lawrence Beeching, Rev. Thomas Willsmere, Rev. Thomas Waverley, Rev. Felix Hope, Rev. Didymus Drinkwater, Rev. Mark Faithfull, Rev. Michael Farrant, Rev. Peter Nettly, Rev. Dymoke Rehoboth, Rev. Peter Flickers, Rev. Varion Manypoyntz, Rev. Ilyd Morgan, Rev. Theophilus Trimmer, Rev. Waverley Hover.

For the typical squire: Vernon Malwood, Frank Coverdale, Sir Harold Tewers, Christopher Longpark, John Bradshaw, Sir Abe Jelly, Roger Blackstaffe, Christopher Covertsides, Ralph Breezilton, Sir Anthony Dashwood, Sir Roger Tod-Harkback.

For the whimsical maiden aunt: Lydia Primrose, Arabella Tyrwhitt, Eliza Dobson, Elfrida Sprett, Penelope Wynter, Suizie Ridrift, Jane Addleshaw, Melithia Twitterdrip, Tabitha Finucane, Lavinia Laycott, Felicity Marrinott, Kezia Barnicott, Rebecca Pye.

For the effeminate artist: Clement Dauber, Lionel Obermann, Raymond Arthur Molines, Maurice Daubigny, Babbington Faddell, Maltby Mahl, Lucien Mandlen, Adelphus Mankin, Valentine Floss, Armelius Maude, Aureolin Greene, Cyril Madderly, Basil Effingham, Percival Fancourt, Oscar le Patourel, Lovel Limpet, Aubrey Vane.

Competition No. 20.

Last week's was perhaps the easiest question which has yet been set. This week we go to the opposite extreme. A correspondent writes to us to suggest that the ACADEMY should offer a prize for the best National Anthem or hymn of joy. The present one is, he thinks, as bad as possible. Personally, we do not agree with him as to its badness, but that it is out of keeping with modern poetical methods is unquestionable. We ask now for new versions, not necessarily following at all on the metrical lines of the old one, expressing what our competitors consider should be the sentiments of an English national anthem. The poem must not exceed 24 lines.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, February 21. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 228. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The "Academy" Bureau.

ON ACCOUNT OF SARAH.

BY E. H. W.

We have read nineteen chapters of this novel, but must go to press before we have finished our perusal. Meanwhile we make haste to say that, as far as we have gone, the novel pleases us very much indeed. It is singularly fresh alike in structure and in imagination. It is aglow with good feeling, buoyancy, and bright humour; and the author manages the Greek Chorus method with unexpected skill. If the remainder of the novel is as good as the portion we have been reading, a proposal for publication will be reported in next week's ACADEMY.

THE VENTURE OF HUACO THE AMANTI.

BY E. A. R.

From the few pages of this work which we have read, we perceive that E. A. R. is a man of academic learning. We refuse, however, to go beyond the few pages. The type-written part of the work is so close that it is trying to our eyes, and the punctuation is abominable. The MS. part is only a little better. We are quite willing to take pains with all works which are submitted to us on fair terms; but the first condition is that we shall be given no trouble in reading. We are quite aware that many a type-writer is not skilled enough to copy a MS. such as that of E. A. R. That may be an explanation from the type-writer to the author with which the author is satisfied; but it is no excuse from the author to the ACADEMY Bureau.

THE GIANTS OF THE CLOUD MOUNTAINS.

BY EDITH WYNTON.

Miss Wynton has written a booklet for children. We can perceive that her intentions are good; but she is not yet able to write the English language with anything like precision.

GLAUCUS AND IONE.

BY E. H. G.

This is a dramatised version, in blank verse, of The Last Days of Pompeii. We cannot say that the romance is improved by E. H. G. He has ease in his medium, and even a certain grace; but often he just fails in the endeavours which promise best. For example:

Some damsel fair hath played the wanton with Thy morning freshness; or some gambling frolic
Hath left thee light of purse—say, is't so?

There are an idea and a latent witticism in these lines; but, whilst the idea is suggested, the witticism is still to seek. Being a young man, E. H. G. may yet do well. At present he does but sketch on blotting-paper with a quill pen.

To Correspondents.

"SOUTHERN SCOT."—We are sorry to find that you think we have been scant in justice to you; but please realise that the task of the Bureau is very arduous. Your work was almost as large as a volume of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Some of the pieces in it, we gather from your letter, you did not wish us to read. You sent a list indicating the pieces by which you were willing to be judged and the order in which we were to study them. If we allowed such a method as that to creep into the Bureau, we should be hard put to it to deal with one book a week. We did not look at your list. We refuse to look at any such lists. We have dozens of works awaiting our consideration, and cannot allow ourselves to be put to any such trouble as you were willing to impose upon us. We are sorry that we fell upon pieces which you yourself denounce; but that was not our fault. We have no desire to be confronted with works which the authors themselves consider unworthy.—We trust that others than "Southern Scot" will take these words to heart.

LOWDEN M'CARTNEY.—Having amended the novel, you should, we think, submit it to the editor of a first-class magazine.

S. P. ARMSTRONG.—The work would receive consideration.

Announcements.

MESSRS. JAMES NISBET & Co. will publish early in March a volume of autobiography by Mr. Felix Moscheles. The book will contain recollections of Mendelssohn and of Rossini, sketches of well-known political figures like Mazzini, and letters and reminiscences of Robert Browning.

THE Life of Danton, by Mr. Hilaire Belloc, late Scholar of Balliol, which Messrs. James Nisbet & Co. will publish early in March, is the first complete study of the great French Revolutionary leader.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish in a few days the opening volumes of two new and important series. The Ecclesiastical History of Evagrius is the first volume of "Byzantine Texts," edited by Prof. Bury and two Belgian scholars, MM. Bidez and Parmentier. The second series, "Oxford Commentaries," of which Dr. Lock, the warden of Keble College and Ireland, Professor of Exegesis at Oxford, is the general editor, opens with The Book of Job, edited by Dr. Gibson, the Vicar of Leeds.

MESSRS. SANDS & Co. will publish almost immediately a new collection of short stories dealing with West Indian life, by Eden Phillpotts. The collection will be called Loup-Garou!

MESSRS. METHUEN will shortly commence the publication of an edition of those novels of W. M. Thackeray which have passed out of copyright. Each book will be in two or three small volumes, and will contain an introduction by Mr. Stephen Gwynn. Each volume will have a photogravure frontispiece.

MR. MACQUEEN will publish immediately The Daughters of Babylon; the new novel by Mr. Wilson Barrett and Mr. Robert Hitchens. The first edition will consist of 20,000 copies.

THE series of letters written by Thomas Carlyle to his sister, which have been appearing in an American magazine, will be published by Chapman & Hall in volume form immediately.

IN his Researches into the Origin of the Primitive Constellations of the Greeks, Phoenicians, and Babylonians, the first volume of which Messrs. Williams & Norgate announce for publication in a few days, Mr. Robert Brown, jun., F.S.A., places in a connected form the result of the investigations of many years respecting the employment of the signs of the Zodiac and of the other time-honoured constellation figures of the classical world.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS.

WHAT D'YE LACK?

Ask Miss MILLARD, of Teddington, Middlesex, for any Book ever issued since the advent of printing (however rare or plentiful) up to the very last work published; also of any article or object of interest under the canopy of heaven, for she prides herself on being enabled, nine times out of ten, to supply these wants. She has the largest assemblage of Miscellaneous Bijiouterie in the world, and is always a ready, willing, and liberal buyer for prompt cash.

"A MIGHTY BOOK HUNTRESS."—Confirmation by a gentleman of supreme eminence.

Sir HARRY POLAND, Q.C., says: "He in fact wrote it so that she might use it, as he considered the books a great find.... She will have achieved a wonderful success in book finding."

If a book exists for sale in any nook on earth Miss MILLARD (who positively will not fail) will find it; nothing daunts her in this fascinating literary sport. Address all wants

The LETTERS of ROBERT BROWNING AND

ELIZABETH BARRETT BARRETT.

* * These Volumes are uniform with "The Letters of Elizabeth Barrett Browning."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"We wish it were possible to give an adequate index of the wealth of these letters in wise and beautiful sayings about life, about poetry, and about love. But it is impossible. Let us simply say again that these volumes are not merely 'unique,' nor merely interesting, but that the world is the richer for being admitted to share in the communion of two noble minds at the hour of their greatest opportunity."

ATHENÆUM.—"Extremely interesting for the various literary criticisms which the two writers interchange about one another's and other people's writing. ...The letters are full of allusions to, and descriptions of, the life, books, and great thinkers of the day."

LITERATURE.—"The picture of the closer and closer approach of two impassioned and enthusiastic natures, as spiritual and intellectual sympathy gradually transforms itself into love, is one of undeniable, and, especially on the woman's side, of remarkable beauty."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"An most priceless addition to the literature of the world. It is safe to say that every lover of the Brownings who reads these volumes—as what lover of them will not?—will rise from them with a warmer admiration than ever for the genius and character of these two strangely attractive persons."

SELAM. By Milena Mrazovic.

"Selam" consists of a series of sketches of Bosnian life and manners. In these days of rapid and easy communication between all quarters of the globe, it is a remarkable fact that the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, lying as they do almost within touch of the most cultured and refined centres of European civilisation, should retain all their pristine simplicity of character, and to all intents and purposes be absolutely unaffected by the countries which lie so near at hand. The main characteristic of the Bosnian people is the strong imaginative power and poetic verve of their Eastern temperament, and this, united with their remarkable mode of life, gives magnificent opportunities for the exercise of the art of the story-teller—opportunities which have not by any means been lost by the author of "Selam." The translator of the book is Mrs. Waugh, who so successfully did the English version of Jókai's "Green Book."

THE NAMELESS CASTLE.

By MAURUS JÓKAI.

The plot of this, the latest of the great Hungarian Romancer's works to be translated into English, may be said to be in a large degree founded on one of the many mysterious rumours as to the fate of the Princess Marie Charlotte Capet, daughter of the ill-fated Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI. Round the personality of this youthful Princess there hangs a charm as nameless as the Castle in which she passes her veiled and secluded life; while the more active members of the dramatis personæ are distinguished by that virile force of character which marks so many of Maurus Jókai's creations.

The Literary Week.

THE issue of the ACADEMY for March 11 will contain a Supplement setting forth the new books that will distinguish the Spring publishing season.

A DRAMATIC library, "the property of a gentleman," was sold by Messrs. Christie this week. Many of the books were unique in character and fairly good prices were realised. The library was Sir Henry Irving's.

IN a short time England (if she follow the lead of America) will be laughing over the opinions of Mr. Dooley; for the book enshrining this entertaining character, Mr. Dooley in Peace and in War, is promised by two publishers, the author having neglected to procure English copyright. The scheme of the work is simple. Mr. Dooley is an Irish-American saloon keeper in Chicago, with opinions on public affairs, and these he delivers to his friends in an exquisite brogue and a wealth of comic and vivid metaphor which even Mulvaney might envy. Much of Dooley's political satire may miss fire here, but his humour should carry the book far.

THE author of the Dooley papers, which appeared and are still appearing weekly in the Chicago Journal, is Mr.

MR. DUNNE, THE AUTHOR OF "MR DOOLEY."

Finley Peter Dunne, the editor of that organ. Mr. Dunne, whose portrait we reproduce, is himself an Irish-American. He is about thirty years of age, and Mr. Dooley represents his real entry into authorship. In America the book is selling enormously and its admirers comprise almost everyone. Admiral Dewey, for example, is particularly delighted, especially with the article—"Cousin George"—in which Dooley claims him as a relative: "Sure Dewey an' Dooley, it's all the same."

HERE is a passage from Mr. Dooley's dissertation on colonisation, written since the publication of the book. This is what he pictures America saying to the Philippines:

"'Naygurs,' we say, 'poor, dissolute, uncovered wretches,' says we, 'whin th' crool hand iv Spain forged mau'cles f'r ye'er limbs, as Hogan says, who was it crossed th' say an' sthruck off th' come-alongs? We did, by dad, we did. An' now, ye mis'erable, childish-minded apes, we propose f'r to larn ye th' uses iv liberty. In ivry city in this unfair land we will erect schoolhouses an' packin' houses an' houses iv correction, an' we'll larn ye our language, because 'tis aisier to larn ye ours than to larn oursilves yours, an' we'll give ye clothes if ye pay f'r thim, an' if ye don't ye cau go without, an' whin ye'er hungry ye can go to th' morgue—we mane th' resth'rant—an' ate a good square meal iv ar'my beef. . . . We can't give ye anny votes because we haven't more thin enough to go round now, but we'll threat ye th' way a father shud threat his childher if we have to break ivry bone in ye'er bodies. So come to our ar'rms,' says we."

DETAILS of the Daily Telegraph's scheme for issuing "the one hundred best novels" are still wanting. A contemporary, however, states—with a prescience not shared by those in authority in Peterborough Court—that the list will include many copyright novels, among them: Diana of the Crossways, Mr. Kipling's Soldiers Three, and Mr. Hall Caine's The Christian. It may be so, but, as we stated last week, nothing is settled.

WE understaud that a West End manager has acquired a new play by the author of "Lady Windermere's Fan."

MR. W. W. JACOBS has written a play in collaboration with Mr. Charles Rock, and it will be produced at the benefit performance for Miss Sarah Thorne.

As illustrating the activity of the promoters of publications from newspaper offices, we may mention that Messrs. W. & R. Chambers were asked to submit their Encyclopædia to this method of publication. They refused.

MR. CLEMENT SHORTER will contribute to the April number of the Contemporary Review a paper on "Illustrated Journalism: Its Past and Its Future."

IN the March number of the Pall Mall Magazine Mr. Quiller Couch draws down the blind of his Cornish window and says good-bye to the readers of his monthly causerie. "I can happily resign it," he adds, "to one of whom I can only say that, had I been asked to nominate a successor, I should have hesitated to choose him solely from fear of seeking too high a compliment. If, as I hope, these pages have been pretty steadily hostile to cant and pretentiousness, if they have tried to preach sanity and moderation in judgment, and in action the more liberal virtues, why, then they owe a part of this to his writings, and, as I need to learn more of these things, I cheerfully step down and, sitting with you, enrol myself among his pupils." The successor in question is Mr. Henley, who will in the course of a month or so begin regular articles under the title of "Ex Libris."

ANOTHER instance of the enterprise now being displayed by the Pall Mall Magazine is the mission to America to study the native stage which it has persuaded Mr. William Archer to undertake. Mr. Archer's articles will be printed in the Pall Mall Magazine. He sails to-morrow (Saturday).

THE question of erecting statues of Chaucer and Milton in the Strand, in connexion with the widening plan, has again come before the London County Council, and the matter has been referred, in a favourable spirit, to the General Purposes and Improvement Committees. The project needs no commendation. And since London wants more, and better, statues, we should like to ask whether a memorial to John Stow has yet been proposed. No man loved London more, and such a statue would coincide with, and strengthen, the growing cult of London's history and weal.

HAZLITT's works are a mine of ideas for the young literary journalist, and his style—which was one of those "aped" by Stevenson—is as clear and nervous as any prose we have. Perhaps the neglect into which he has fallen with the public is due to the want of good and accessible editions of his more popular writings. If so, the scheme now on foot at Maidstone, Hazlitt's birthplace, to form a "Hazlitt Society" may be welcomed as a reaction. At the same time, one is a little astonished to find that in a comparatively small rural town there is this sudden appreciation of Hazlitt's cold but agile mind. A prophet has perhaps only to be sufficiently neglected abroad to be taken back and honoured in his own country; but if Hazlitt could still wield the pen, the event might inspire him to add a personal note to his reflections on "Londoners and Country People."

MR. HENRY NORMAN, after several years' connexion with the Daily Chronicle, as special correspondent and assistant editor, is leaving, in order to have more time for private literary work, and a little over for his farm. Mr. Norman has long promised a book on "The Near East"; his Far East, though out of print, is constantly asked for, and his Real Japan awaits new chapters that will bring it to date. Mr. Norman has, therefore, immediate work to occupy him for some months. He leaves with the handsomest acknowledgments of his services to the paper from the proprietors of the Chronicle.

THE readers of the Chronicle having gained their point with regard to the "Golden Treasury" edition of Fitzgerald's Omar Khayyám, a correspondent has now written to ask for a cheap Plato. Several of the Dialogues are already to be had in the "Golden Treasury," but nothing will satisfy this gentleman but Jowett complete. He is willing to pay seven-and-sixpence a volume. The matter rests with the Oxford University Press.

WE have received, in the Collection d'Auteurs Étrangers, published by the Société du Mercure de France, La Machine à Explorer le Temps, par H. G. Wells, translated by Henry-D. Davray. In his preface M. Davray suggests Jules Verne, Poe, and Villiers de l'Isle-Adam as Mr. Wells's literary parents.

WE give this week a portrait of E. L. Voynich, the author of The Gadfly. Mrs. Ethel Lillian Voynich, to give this lady her full name, was a Miss Boole. She married a Polish gentleman a few years ago. The Gadfly was her first published story.

MR. T. GIBSON BOWLES, M.P., whom Mr. Punch always represents as a disabled mariner, and whom most people know only as a lively and vigilant Parliamentary critic of naval estimates and maritime affairs, now figures as the M.C. who introduces the British reader to a translation of Edmond About's Trente et Quarante. The translator is Lord Newton, and the publisher is Mr. Arnold. Mr. Gibson Bowles commends the work of his fellow M.P. We find in his remarks this passage, which may or may not have party signification: "This latter literature [light literature], like the grass of the field, is for all; that other and heavier literature, like the orchid, never was, nor is, nor can be, but for the few; and he is more blessed who makes two blades of grass to grow where one grew before than he who makes two orchids so to do."

APPROPOS of the Browning Letters, which are reviewed elsewhere in our columns this week, a correspondent of the Westminster Gazette has hit upon an interesting parallel between a passage in Mr. Browning's first love letter to his wife (January 10, 1848) and two stanzas of his exquisite poem, "By the Fireside," written much later :

You were too unwell, and now it is years ago, and I feel as at some untoward passage in my travels, as if I had been close, so close, to some world's-wonder in chapel or crypt, only a screen to push and I might have entered, but there was some slight, so it seems, slight and just sufficient bar to admission, and the half-opened door shut, and I went home my thousands of miles and the sight was never to be.	Had she willed it, still had stood the screen, So slight, so sure 'twixt my love and her. I could fix her face with a guard between. And find her soul as when friends confer— Friends, lovers that might have been. And, again, a few lines below : A moment after and hands unseen Were hanging the night around us fast, But we knew that a bar was broken between Life and life, we were mixed at last, In spite of the mortal screen.

MR. WALKLEY chose a distressingly timely subject for his essay in the Chronicle last Saturday, when he wrote of "Books for Influenza." Most people have influenza now, and all would read if they could. Mr. Walkley tried Borrow, Balzac, Peacock, Bagehot, Cassanova, Dickens, and Miss Austen. All were in vain. He then tried Mr. Birrell and was healed, or, at any rate, refreshed; which lends point to our remark last week that there is nothing for the sick room like "birrelling."

THE fund started last year by friends and admirers of Miss Yonge, for the establishment of a "Charlotte Yonge Scholarship," at the Winchester High School, is progressing well. £6,000 are required, and already £1,200 have been received. The Hon. Treasurer, who will be glad to receive further sums, is the Rev. J. H. Merriott, Dormy Cottage, Winchester.

ANOTHER freak (or prodigy) magazine reaches us from America. This is The Kiote, a "New Venture by a New Folk in a New Field, being a Literary Monthly dedicated to the Prairie Yelper." Such a dedication seems unnecessary, but The Kiote lies before us, and its two managers are Schuyler W. Miller and Harry G. Shedd, and it has been entered as second-class matter in the post office at Lincoln, Nebraska, and was "done into print" at the Ivy Press in the same city. We quote from one of the "Yelps" at the end: "If in the days to come any man should remit unto our Business Managers the Coin that will bring him our cheering words for a second year, we shall decree that man (or that woman) a Companion of the Terrestrial Order of the Double Kiote. And all this in acknowledgment of his loyalty and endurance and his Coin. Moreover we shall send unto him the Badge of the Order, and a Patent of Nobility. The Badge will have a Hole in it, whereby it may be attached by a String to any Collar the Companion may see fit to procure. And as for the Patent, he may preserve that beside his Ink-horn and Quill, to assure him that he is indeed not as other Men. The Word hath gone forth."

NIETZSCHE, after a long period of inaccessibility in this country, is being brought to our very doors. Mr. Unwin has undertaken to complete the English edition of his works begun by the firm of Henry & Co. some two years ago. The Genealogy of Morals, in Dr. Hausmann's translation, is promised next month, and there will also be the Poems in Mr. John Gray's version. After will come Thus Spake Zarathustra and the Anti-Christ. Thus Spake Zarathustra is also promised by the publishers of The Eagle and the Serpent in a rival translation.

THE West End Review has this week passed from monthly to weekly existence, and must henceforth be numbered among the regular sixpenny illustrated papers. The move is a bold one, and we wish the venture success—the more heartily because the first weekly number is an enterprising one. Its supplement, four coloured designs of the Seasons, by Mr. Lewis Baumer, will be welcomed for decorative purposes.

WE have received from the British Patents Company in Glasgow a device for resting the eyes of writers and readers. It consists of a card on which are printed four rows of variegated bright coloured discs. When the eyes are fatigued, the contemplation of these discs refreshes them.

THE writer of the article on "Toplady as Literature," which we published on February 4, writes: "I see that the Catholic Herald, as well as your correspondent E. S. N., controverts my statement that the Roman Church 'even discards the "Lead, Kindly Light," of its own great son.' The former declares of its own knowledge that 'the hymn is taught in Catholic schools, practised in Catholic colleges, and sung in Catholic churches,' while your own correspondent sends you one of the Catholic Truth Society's leaflets containing the hymn. I cannot, of course, call in question this expert evidence; but I, too, may fairly claim to be an expert in this matter. A member of a Roman Catholic family, all of whose relations and many of whose friends belong to that Church, and with many years' experience of my own of its hymns, I may be permitted to say that I have never seen 'Lead, Kindly Light,' in a Catholic hymn-book, and never heard it sung in a Catholic church. Neither have any of the relations and friends I have consulted ever seen or heard it in these connexions. The choirmaster in a Catholic church in London from whom I have made inquiries is in the same position. The explanation probably is that Catholics have begun to use the hymn only of recent years, and here and there—certainly I am satisfied that its use is by no means general, or even frequent,—and in any case this incident is one more indication of the variableness of expert evidence."

THERE is a bookseller in Cannon-alley, close by St. Paul's, whose methods recall the grand old days when booksellers were partisans and doctrinaires. Attached to his shelves of books, ranged against a brick wall, are written statements of the bookseller's views on questions of politics and morality. Thus to one mass of harmless miscellaneous literature is pinned the declaration: "I like a burglar and a Roman Catholic better than a High Churchman who takes pay for one thing and does another." The result is a crowd, and, no doubt, purchases.

Bibliographical.

I SEE Messrs. Hurst & Blackett announce Mr. Beavan's James and Horace Smith for an early date in March. There seems to be an impression that those two worthies have already been "biographed." Not so. Horace wrote a slight sketch of his brother by way of preface to a selection from James's Comic Miscellanies, but that is all. Of the two brothers the world at present knows little—save that they were joint authors of the Rejected Addresses, and that while James was "great" at humorous trifles in verse, Horace was "immense" at novels which nobody nowadays ever reads. They were an interesting pair, and in writing their Lives Mr. Beavan has had, I am told, the advantage of drawing upon a diary left by their highly respectable father, Mr. Robert Smith—a public official who had a pretty wit of his own, which he evidently transmitted to his sons. Horace, for a time, looked after the business interests of Shelley, and that in itself would have been sufficient to give to him, and retain for him, a place in literary history.

James Smith's jeux d'esprit, whether written or spoken, are in all the collections. The Rejected Addresses, too, have been reprinted of late years in shilling volumes, within the reach of almost everybody. I think it might pay someone to collect James Smith's "epigrams," and so forth—the more especially if the same volume sheltered the Horace in London of both brothers. This last-named is, as many people know, a free adaptation of the first and second books of Horace's Odes to the needs and tastes of Londoners in the second decade of this century. It cannot be said that Horace in London is a work of finished art, but it has some engaging qualities, and it is just possible that a reprint of it (with James Smith's collected comicalities) might do more than pay expenses. It would certainly be welcome to the literary student who may be forming a library.

Somebody has written a play on the subject of Nell Gwyn, which somebody else has undertaken to produce before long; and in that connexion the theatrical gossip of the Daily News, referring to the late Mr. Peter Cunningham's Story of Nell Gwyn, remarks that that work must now be tolerably scarce. And scarce in its original form it very probably is. But, rather more than six years ago, it occurred to Mr. H. B. Wheatley to prepare, and to Mr. W. W. Gibbings to publish, a new edition of Cunningham's book, with numerous annotations (hitherto unprinted) by the author, with a memoir of Cunningham himself, and with an introduction into which Mr. Wheatley compressed all the new matter about Nell which had come to light since the original issue of the Story. This edition, I take it, is still extant, and may be recommended to the discerning public. It tells them all about Nell which it is meet to know.

Dr. Garnett's career as a man of letters appears to have begun just forty years ago, and, characteristically, with a little book of original verse—Primula: this was immediately followed by another volume of original rhyme—Io in Egypt, and Other Poems. Dr. Garnett has, indeed, been faithful to the muse. He gave us in succession Poems from the German (1862), Idylls and Epigrams (1869), Iphigenia in Delphi, &c. (1891), Poems (1893), and translated sonnets by Dante, Petrarch, Camoens (1896). It is not, I find, at all generally known that Dr. Garnett is the second Richard Garnett who has "kept the books" at the British Museum. The first (who, to be accurate, was "Assistant Keeper") was the father of the second, by whom the Philological Essays of the elder Garnett were edited, with a memoir, in 1859.

The new edition of Carlyle's Cromwell, in which both text and annotation will be brought quite down to date, will be an appropriate celebration of the tercentenary. Since the work went out of copyright there have been several reprints of it. Routledge's brought out one in three volumes, and Ward & Lock another in one volume—both in 1888. Four years later came a reprint in the "Minerva Library." The date of the first publication was 1845; in 1846 the book was re-issued with additions. Then came editions in 1850 and 1866. Since Carlyle wrote, the memoirs of Cromwell have been numerous and from many points of view. It may be that Mr. Gardiner is destined to give us the definitive biography; meanwhile, we are soon to have a treatise on Cromwell as a Soldier only.

Do people still read the works of F. E. Smedley? I suppose they do, or a new edition of them would not be announced to appear. Frank Fairleigh and Lewis Arundel, I note, were reprinted so recently as 1892. Smedley was fortunate, inasmuch as Cruikshank (in 1878) illustrated his Frank Fairleigh, and "Phiz" illustrated his Lewis Arundel and Harry Coverdale (1852 and 1854). He wrote a fourth story, The Fortunes of the Colville Family, which seems not to have been reprinted since 1867. His Gathered Leaves were edited by Edmund Yates in 1865.

The new book promised by Mr. Richard Whiteing—a novel, apparently—is sure to arouse interest. Mr. Whiteing has published, in book form, comparatively little. His best-known work, The Island: or an Adventure of a Person of Quality, was reprinted about ten years ago. Another story, The Democracy, was sent forth in 1876 under the pseudonym of "Whyte Thorne." Mr. Sprouts: his Opinions, dates as far back as 1867. Mr. Whiteing made, in 1870, some additions to a book on Wonderful Escapes—and that, I think, is all.

Mr. Felix Moscheles, who is going, it is said, to print his Recollections, has already put on record his life In Bohemia with George du Maurier; and a pleasant little volume that was. Otherwise literature knows him only as the translator of Letters of Felix Mendelssohn rather more than a decade ago.

The Browning Letters.

The Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Barrett.
2 vols. (Smith, Elder & Co. 21s.)

MANY good gifts have come to English literature from the two Brownings, husband and wife, besides those poems which are their greatest. The gift of one's poems is the gift of oneself. But in a fuller sense have this unique pair now given themselves by what we can but call the gracious gift of these letters. As their union was unique, so is this correspondence unique, even in an age of self-revelation. The love-letters of Keats are but one side of a correspondence. Here we have both sides, where man

Friday Evening

When I come back from seeing you, and think over it all, there never is a least word of yours I could not occupy myself with, and wish to return to you with some... as to say all the thoughts & feelings it is sure to call out of me:—there is nothing in you that does not draw out all of me:—you possess me, dearest, and there is no help for the expressing it all, no voice nor hand, but those of mine which shrink and turn away from the attempt—so you must go on, patiently, knowing me, and your entire power on me, and I will console myself, to the full extent, with your knowledge, penetration, intuition... to whom I must believe you can get to what is here, in me, without the pretence of my telling or writing it. But because give up the great achievements, there is no reason I should not seize any occasion of making clear one of the few important points that arise in our intercourse if I fancy I can do it with the least success & for instance, it is on my mind to explain what I meant yesterday by trusting that the entire happiness I feel in the letters, and the help in the criticism, might not be...

FIRST PAGE OF A LETTER FROM ROBERT BROWNING TO MISS BARRETT.

and woman were alike richly dowered. Nor is our pleasure marred by that painful element which made the Keats correspondence to many of us deplorable as would be the phonographic record of a lingering death-bed. The son of the writers is the editor, and we have to thank him that he has given us the letters in their intimate integrity. The gift is gracious, it is also singular, coming to us (indirectly) from the hands, and with the implicit sanction of, Robert Browning, as his son explains in the brief prefatory note. We know the mainly impersonal character of Browning's poetry; but more, we remember that poem in which he emphasised his detestation of self-revelation. He cast scorn on Byron as the type of self-revealers; and told us that we might have a peep in his window, but nothing more. The final stanza clinched the protest by a reference to Shakespeare's Sonnets:

"With this key Shakespeare unlocked his heart." . . .
Did he? So much the less Shakespeare he!

It is a glad surprise that, posthumously, he should have allowed us this rich insight into his most sacred chamber.

The letters are the most opulent in various interest which have been published for many a day. Mainly, of course, it is an interest literary and personal. But so full are both interests that it becomes a matter of no little difficulty what is to be left unnoticed. The character of Browning's own letters is to us, in one way, a surprise. If there is one prominent note of Browning the poet, it is his strong, cool voice. (The adjectives, if we remember aright, are Mr. Aubrey de Vere's.) Neither quality is absent here; but it is no little unexpected to find Mrs. Browning (or, rather, Miss Barrett) charging him with "an impetuous character," and the charge fully justified by his letters. His very first letter exhibits it. The circumstances of that letter are related by himself. He had admired her poetry, heard much about her from their common friend, Mr. Kenyon, but had not been drawn to her acquaintance. At length Mr. Kenyon lent him some volumes of hers, in which he was touched (as who would not have been?) by finding his own name. It was, no doubt, the lines in "Lady Geraldine's Courtship":

From Browning some "Pomegranate," which, if cut dee down the middle,
Shows a heart within blood-tinctured, of a veined humanity.

After consulting Kenyon, he determined to write to the author. Bearing in mind that he was personally unacquainted with her, the letter (admitting the stimulus of the personal praise) shows a quite youthful ardour and emotional impulse—very delightful and poet-like. We quote part of it, though it is among the shortest of these mostly long and very long letters:

I love your verses with all my heart, dear Miss Barrett—and this is no off-hand complimentary letter that I shall write—whatever else, no prompt, matter-of-course recognition of your genius, and there a graceful and natural end of the thing. . . . Into me it has gone, and part of me has it become, this great living poetry of yours, not a flower of which but took root and grew. . . . Talking with whoever is worthy, I can give a reason for my faith in one and another excellence, the fresh, strange music, the affluent language, the exquisite pathos, and true, new, brave thought. . . . I do, as I say, love these books with all my heart—and I love you too. Do you know I was once not very far from seeing—really seeing you? Mr. Kenyon said to me one morning: "Would you like to see Miss Barrett?" Then he went to announce me—then he returned . . . you were too unwell; and now it is years ago, and I feel as at some untoward passage in my travels, as if I had been close, so close, to some world's wonder in chapel or crypt, only a screen to push and I might have entered; but there was some slight, so it now seems, slight and just sufficient, bar to admission, and the half-opened door shut, and I went home my thousands of miles, and the sight was never to be!

Well, these Poems were to be, and this true, thankful joy and pride with which I feel myself,

Yours ever faithfully,

ROBERT BROWNING.

That is praise; full, generous, patently heartfelt. No wonder that it drew an instant answer:

I thank you, dear Mr. Browning, from the bottom of my heart. You meant to give me pleasure by your letter—and even if the object had not been answered, I ought still to thank you. But it is thoroughly answered. Such a letter from such a hand! Sympathy is dear—very dear to me: but the sympathy of a poet, and of such a poet, is the quintessence of sympathy to me! Will you take back my gratitude for it?—agreeing, too, that of all the commerce done in the world, from Tyre to Carthage, the exchange of sympathy for gratitude is the most princely thing!

She goes on to ask his criticism of her faults. "The most frequent general criticism I receive is, I think, upon the style—'if I would but change my style!' But that is an objection (isn't it?) to the writer bodily?" Poor Miss Barrett! It certainly is. She only shared the common fate of original writers, who are told by really benevolent critics that if they were totally unlike themselves, and like other people who have gone before them, it is quite possible they might one day write decently. As it is, &c. It is more difficult to quote from her than from Browning; for she is impetuous with a voluble and feminine impetuosity, so that her striking things are apt to be said at length, and require much context for their due understanding. It is no surprise in her case; without the evidence of her previous letters, her poems would have prepared us for this precipitant impulse. She knew it, and gives a most characteristic picture of her temperament:

When I had an Italian master, years ago, he told me that there was an unpronounceable English word which exactly expressed me, and which he would say in his own tongue, as he could not say it in mine—testa lunga. Of course the Signor meant headlong!—and now I have had enough to tame me, and might be expected to stand still in my stall. But you see I do not. Headlong I was at first, and headlong I continue—precipitously rushing forward through all manner of nettles and briars instead of keeping the path; guessing at the meaning of unknown words instead of looking in the dictionary—tearing open letters, and never untying a string—and expecting everything to be done in a minute, and the thunder to be as quick as the lightning. . . . Our common friend, Mr. Horne, is often forced to entreat me into patience and coolness of purpose, though his only intercourse with me has been by letter.

That is Elizabeth Barrett through and through; yet withal the gentlest, most patient, and sympathetic of women. Nor do we get less authentic glimpses of Browning. Besides that unsuspected impetuosity, one sees also the rooted dramatic nature of the man. At the time the letters begin he was growing tired of being "Robert Browning, the writer of plays"; he tells Miss Barrett that he wants to have done with all that, and to get himself into his poetry. It is very curious to learn this. He did cease writing plays. But dramatic he never ceased to be —for he could not. We see this from a little passage where he is discussing the projected "Luria," his last play:

This "Luria" you inquire about . . . Luria is a Moor, of Othello's country, and devotes himself to something he thinks Florence, and the old fortune follows—all in my brain yet, but the bright weather helps, and I will soon loosen my Braccio and Puccio (a pale, discontented man), and Tiburzio (the Pisan, a good fellow this one), and Domizia the Lady—loosen all these on dear, foolish (ravishing must his folly be), golden-hearted Luria, all these with their worldly wisdom and Tuscan shrewd ways; and, for me, the misfortune is, I sympathise just as much with these as with him.

Of course he did, and it shows how vain was his dream of laying away the dramatic poet which was deep down in him, not to be laid aside. Golden-hearted these letters truly show him. But with all that, and the generous impetuosity too, shrewdness and worldly wisdom are writ large in him. His calm tolerance for the most differing natures is very striking in this correspondence. It is striking also to see how the twisted mode of thought the expression broken up by all manner of dashes and parentheses—which characterises his verse come out likewise in letter-writing. As for those subtler points of character which you cannot label with this or that adjective, and pin down by abstract names, these must be sought in the letters themselves, where they are revealed by both the friends without pose or after-thought.

Besides character, there are three several kinds of interest, in all of which these letters are amazingly rich—literary discussion, side-lights on eminent people, and, finally, the growth of their mutual passion. The outpouring on literary topics of two such minds, provoking and reverberating each other's thoughts, would alone make the volumes fascinating. Yet it is not easy to cite, for these utterances are mostly at subtle length. But take this fine self-criticism of Browning's:

I never have begun, even, what I hope I was born to begin and end—"R. B., a Poem"—and next, if I speak . . . as if what you have read were sadly imperfect demonstrations of even mere ability, it is from no absurd vanity, though it might seem so—these scenes and song-scrap are such mere and very escapes of my inner power, which lives in me like the light in those crazy Mediterranean phares I have watched at sea, wherein the light is ever revolving in a dark gallery, bright and alive, and only after a weary interval leaps out for a moment from the one narrow chink, and then goes on with the blind wall between it and you; and, no doubt, then, precisely, does the poor drudge that carries the cresset set himself most busily to trim the wick—for don't think I want to say I have not worked hard (this head of mine knows better), but the work has been inside, and not when, at stated intervals, I held up my light to you; and that there is no self-delusion here I would prove to you (and nobody else), even by opening this desk I write on, and showing what stuff, in way of wood, I could make a great bonfire with, if I could only knock the whole clumsy top off my tower!

This passage shows both the intricate length of such utterances, and the fine imagery which is scattered through the correspondence. Metaphor is the common coin of both friends when they are earnest: the poet is plain on every page of theirs. But if Browning's bits of this sort are hard to quote, Miss Barrett's are still more so, in their spreading inundation of thought and diction. One might as well try to scoop a wave out of the sea. As a sample of the illusive interest which we have referred to, we may copy an account of that famous performance when "Every Man in His Humour" was presented, with Dickens as Bobadil. It has the advantage of manageable limit. Thus writes Browning :

The theatricals went off with great éclat, and the performance was really good, really clever, or better. Forster's Kately was very emphatic and earnest, and grew into great interest, quite up to the poet's allotted tether, which is none of the longest. He pitched the character's keynote too gravely, I thought—beginning with certainty, rather than mere suspicion, of evil! Dickens' Bobadil was capital—with perhaps a little too much of the consciousness of entire cowardice . . . which I don't so willingly attribute to the noble would-be pacificator of Europe, besieger of Strigonium, &c.—but the end of it all was really pathetic, as it should be, for Bobadil is only too clever for the company of fools he makes wonderment for, having once the misfortune to relish their society, and to need but too pressingly their "tobacco-money," what can he do but suit himself to their capacities? And D. Jerrold was very amusing and clever in his "Country Gull"; and Mr. Leech superb in the Town Master Mathew. All were good, indeed, and were voted good, and were called on, and cheered off, and praised heartily behind their backs and before the curtain. Stanfield's function had exercise solely in the touching-up (very effectively) sundry "Scenes"—painted scenes—and the dresses, which were perfect, had the advantage of Mr. Maclise's experience. And—all is told!

Full of such intimate glimpses are the letters; some (of Miss Mitford) rather painful in their revelation of ill-natured gossiping tendency—on Miss Mitford's part. We have but scratched the surface of this opulent correspondence; and the passionate, personal side of it we have scarce handled.

A Child of God.

S. Francis of Assisi, the Mirror of Perfection. Edited by Paul Sebatier. Translated by Sebastian Evans. (Nutt.)

THE Blessed Brother Pacifico was praying before a crucifix : "and when he began to pray, he was lifted up and snatched away into Heaven, whether in the body or out of the body God only knoweth, and saw in Heaven many seats, whereof he saw one higher than the rest, and glorious beyond them all, shining and made fair with every precious stone. And, marvelling at the beauty thereof, he began to think within himself whose seat it should be. And straightway he heard a voice saying unto him : 'This seat was the seat of Lucifer, and in his stead shall the humble Francis sit therein.'" This little book, which, as its title-page tells us pleasantly, was "written by Brother Leo of Assisi, edited by Paul Sebatier, translated by Sebastian Evans, published by David Nutt," does great credit to the four gentlemen named; but it contains nothing more satisfactorily beautiful than that vision of Brother Pacifico. Deposuit potentes de sedo: et exaltavit humiles. "I saw Lucifer, like lightning, fall from heaven," says one; and in fulness of time another saw the rent, the throne of the ruined archangel, the vacant sphere and palace of his glory, filled by the "poorling" husband of poverty. There is more in this than in Hamlet's conjectures concerning imperial Caesar's clay and its eventual uses. This is a legend of that faith against which, in its beginnings, a deputation of respectable persons lodged with the authorities the true complaint, that it was "turning the world upside down"; turning it, in truth, from hell to heaven. And the humble Francis replaces the fallen Angel, that lamentable and calamitous Great One: that "Prince of Darkness" who, let correspondents of a certain journal stomach it as they may, "is a gentleman"; of transcendent ability and literally splendid origin. Here is celestial allopathy: no case of similia similibus. Francis had not even the pride of glorying in his insignificance, his despicability, his humility: he loved to show himself, not as the ostentatious and unmistakable ascetic, but as a very natural Christian man.

Dickens, that highly popular but undervalued writer, wrote a sketch called "Tom Tiddler's Ground." It deals with a "gentleman of property" and intelligence, who assumes the part of misanthropic hermit, foul and conceited, delighting in his wide local fame in that comfortless and idealist capacity: it riddles him, it exposes him almost naked but for the encrusting dirt, more insanely proud than any clean potentate receiving public plaudits in gorgeous raiment. Such a figure is frequent in all religions: the men whose rags, when seen by others, become to him as cloth of gold, and his unsavouriness as a sweet incense. Francis was natural; no sign of disease upon him; a humorist, good fellow, shrewd man of affairs; kindly, courteous, "clubbable"; and a saint so divinely human that he might have been "the Beloved Disciple." His beautiful simplicity is what strikes and stirs the modern mind; not, as with our forefathers, his extravagance. Early in the century, one Eustace, a Roman Catholic priest of the old-fashioned English type, wrote a Classical Tour in Italy, which Dickens has ridiculed, and which was a favourite with Mr. Pater, from whose own copy we quote. Upon reaching "Assisium," as the classical gentleman calls it, he dwells upon "the founder of an order more extraordinary perhaps and more numerous, though less useful and less respectable, than that of the Benedictines." Then follow extravagant references to Lyeurgus and Cicero, puzzled and deprecatory praises, and the sober conclusion that, "without being his disciples, we may very safely consider him as a great and wonderful personage." Excellent and cautious Mr. Eustace! The present generation may not be more inclined to walk in Franciscan footsteps, but assuredly it feels less perplexity of admiration, less hesitation of sympathy: the age of Thoreau and Walt Whitman and Count Tolstoi can hail in Francis a reformer of life, free from folly and from failure. He has for ever shown the possibilities of spiritual wealth in poverty, of spiritual comfort in suffering, of spiritual greatness in obscurity, of spiritual glory in humility. The genius of Mr. Shorthouse once created a Duke, who said: "My son is a far greater noble than I could ever be; his mother was one of Nature's peeresses." If this sort of metaphor is to be allowed, we know not what dignity by right divine of nature did not belong to Francis: the coarse-clad, bare-foot, half-starved poverello was "one of Nature's" Popes and Emperors, an hierarch and monarch among men; worthy to be, in the supernatural order, the counterpoise and contrast to the fallen Son of the Morning.

Readers of Mr. Barrie's touching tales of lowly Scottish life must often be disturbed, distressed, by a kind of innocent snobbishness apparent in natures of an exquisite beauty and fine feeling: that reluctance to let your neighbour know the truth about your condition and circumstance, though there be no shame nor discredit in them, which is a passion even in the sweet-souled Jess. One wonders what Francis would have thought of Thrums: of Jess and Leebie "preparing to receive company," and acting several lies so as to seem more socially considerable and genteel than they are, or have any need to be. It is venial, but ugly, this shame when there is no cause for shame; the spirit of Francis pours ridicule upon those dingy sides of life, and not alone in Thrums, but in all the bustling Babylons of the world. Thanks to "our Lady Poverty," Francis was never worried; he was often anguished, but of worry, word and thing, he did not know the meaning. His self-reproach, his solicitude for others, his hungerings of soul, his burden of desire, are visible and vocal in Brother Leo's plain legend; but the world never troubled him. He sang his way through it with an urgent gaiety and blitheness, loving it, but caring not a jot for its standards of opinion; he "kept sadness to himself and God only," showing to the world a decent joyousness, an unclouded countenance, a serene carriage, a princely ease and graciousness of mien. So he had none but noble cares: most of our cares are ignoble. He did what Turgenev's young Russian idealists long to do, what Brook Farms and the like in America have tried to do: he "simplified" himself. But it was thanks to no theory; he did not artificially cast off artificiality. Accepting, without questionings, the second nature of Christian grace, he became not less, nor more, than man, but natural man with a divine difference. The "seraphic saint," to put it boldly and frankly, is just one of ourselves without our selfishness, our insane and vexing absorption in ourselves.

This is the happy warrior: this is he Whom every man-at-arms would wish to be.

Dr. Sebastian Evans has most delicately translated Brother Leo's lovable Latin, preserving all its fragrant charm and unsought distinction; and his preface is worthy of the work. Those who wish to know its history, its position in the Franciscan legend, and all else that hagiographical scholarship might desire to learn, must consult M. Sebatier's Paris edition, which gives the original text, and everything necessary or possible in the way of elucidation. The little book now published by Mr. Nutt is one of those elect works to be read, as Thomas à Kempis has it, in Angulo, to the soul's comfort and delight; it belongs to the true faery or folk-lore of the saints, and has an intense individual beauty. It takes us to that Umbrian countryside, which the footprints of Francis and his brethren have left to us for an Holy Land; to the hills and valleys, woods and streams, where the music of our saint is singing, and bird and beast obey him lovingly, and the light of our "Brother Sun" seems purer than elsewhere. It is the land of him who so loved the loveliness of water, that "whenever he did wash his hands, he would make choice of such a place, as that the water which fell should not be trodden by his feet"; who paid loving reverence to the trees and flowers, whose heart went out towards every living thing, who felt earth and air, and water and fire, to be tremulous and overflowing with the beauty of their witness to the beauty and the love of God; whose holy and rejoicing humility raised him to the expectant seat of Lucifer in the unwintering and everlasting Paradise.

Mr. Birrell on Copyright.

Seven Lectures on the Law and History of Copyright. By Augustine Birrell, Q.C., M.P. (Cassell.)

WE fear it must be confessed at the outset that Mr. Birrell has been ill-advised in publishing his lectures in the present form. As Quain Professor of Law at University College, he recently delivered eighteen lectures on the general subject of Copyright. Had he issued a full report of these lectures, we should, doubtless, have been able to welcome a standard work on the subject. Unfortunately, the volume before us only contains seven of the "more popular of these lectures, which," says Mr. Birrell in his preface, "I have thought it worth while to reprint, because the law on the subject is expected before long to engage what is sometimes called 'the attention of Parliament.'" But why only the "more popular lectures"? It is hardly to be expected that, even under the guidance of the genial author of Obiter Dicta, the study of copyright is likely to become a popular pastime. There is pleasant reading in the book for the general reader interested in the history of literary production, but there is much dull and stiff reading too. On the other hand, the lawyer will have little use for the book, which is not full or detailed enough for the purpose of consultation, and which in no way supersedes the acknowledged authorities. From the preface quoted above, we gather that Mr. Birrell addresses particularly those who, in the near future, will be called upon to deliberate on Lord Herschell's Copyright Amendment Bill; but to them, also, his book will be of little service. It contains, it is true, quotations from the principal clauses of that Bill—which may be obtained in full from the Queen's printers—but it does not contain what the members of Parliament might be supposed to be in need of—detailed criticisms of those clauses, suggested amendments, lists of omissions. It must surely be clear to all that no one is likely to enter upon the thorny path of the discussion of the present state of copyright unless compelled to do so by the exigencies of business. But Mr. Birrell's manual is not for business men who want their facts tabulated, cut and dried; who detest irrelevance, and care not a jot for the humours of the discussion. And is anyone likely to need a new exposition of the copyright law when, in all probability, that law will be completely changed in the course of a few months?

The pleasant reading for the general reader, which we have referred to, is to be found in the first lectures, which are devoted to a survey of the origin and subsequent history of copyright before the Act of 1842. These lectures are written in a bright and attractive manner, full of the quips and cranks which we always look for in "birrelling," and form an admirable introduction to the history of the production and multiplication of books. It cannot, however, be said that they add anything of importance to our knowledge of the subject. We are not blaming Mr. Birrell for this. It is admittedly writing for the "general" public, not for what we might, perhaps, call "professional" bookmen.

The later lectures are more important because more controversial. Lecture V. deals with the enactments since the time of Queen Anne, and contains a summary and a meagre criticism of the Copyright Act of 1842. Mr. Birrell's arguments against the duration of copyright from the date of first publication strike us as being, on the whole, conclusive. It is obviously wrong "to throw open to printers the early and uncorrected editions of a work at a time when the later and corrected ones are still protected," and the clauses in Lord Herschell's new Bill, giving copyright for an author's lifetime and a term of years, offer in every way a more rational and satisfactory arrangement. We are sorry to note that Mr. Birrell does not draw attention—at least, when considering the clauses of the Act of 1842—to the absurdities of registration at Stationers' Hall, which is an annoying and perfectly useless formality.

Mr. Birrell discusses only two omissions from the Act of 1842—the question of translation and the right of dramatisation of novels. The new Bill deals fully with these points, but Mr. Birrell thinks "it will be found difficult to do more than prevent the bodily appropriation by the dramatist of the ipsissima verba of the novelists." In this we do not agree. It is true that "plots, situations, and scenes" have to some extent become common property, but it should not be difficult, or at least not impossible, to detect and prove the appropriation of plots, and situation, and scene. There is a vast difference between the appropriation of a general idea and the deliberate larceny of a whole plot.

We have left ourselves no space for a criticism of Mr. Birrell's concluding lectures on "Literary Larceny" and "The Present Situation." Both are fair statements of the case, but the weakness of both is that they offer no suggestions of any moment. Of the general character of the chapter on "Literary Larceny" the concluding paragraph is a fair sample:

The subject of literary larceny is not, from the lawyer's point of view, one of much importance, while from the author's it may safely be said that frankly to acknowledge indebtedness has always been a tradition honoured in the observance.

The subject is really of increasing importance from the author's point of view, for it includes the vexed question of quotation in reviews and magazine articles, &c., which Mr. Birrell discusses very inadequately, making no mention of the recent important case of the Review of Reviews.

Mr. Birrell touches lightly upon the question of newspaper "pilfering," but he offers no remedy for a very real grievance. All who have read Mr. Moberly Bell's evidence before the Copyright Commission will understand how imperative it is that some law on the subject should be introduced.

The review, too, of the present situation with which the book closes is altogether inadequate. If Mr. Birrell had taken the new Bill clause by clause, examining and criticising, he would have rendered a signal service to literary men and to literature. The Bill contains, as was shown in these columns at the time of its appearance, a number of omissions and several clauses in urgent need of amendment, especially in relation to copyright of lectures, colonial (particularly Canadian) and international copyright. But he has contented himself with long quotations and a few remarks upon the Canadian question, which, if it is to be discussed at all, must be discussed fully and at length, for it is crammed with complications.

There is in this last chapter a digression upon the subject of the relations between publisher and author which has nothing to do with the question of copyright, but which we welcome as containing the sanest and most unbiassed utterance on this question which we have come across for some time.

"She Certainly Had the Finest Hand of Any Woman in the World."

The "Perverse Widow." By Arthur W. Crawley-Boevey.
(Longmans. 42s.)

"WHEN he is in town, he lives in Soho-square. It is said he keeps himself a bachelor by reason he was crossed in love by a perverse, beautiful widow of the next county to him. Before this disappointment Sir Roger was what you call a fine gentleman, had often supped with my Lord Rochester and Sir George Etherege, fought a duel upon his first coming to town, and kicked bully Dawson in a public coffee-house for calling him youngster. But being ill-used by the above-mentioned widow, he was very serious for a year and a half; and though, his temper being naturally jovial, he at last got over it, he grew careless of himself, and never dressed afterwards." And who was this perverse, beautiful widow of the next county that wrought such a change in the Worcestershire baronet? For years and years commentators on the Spectator have played with the theory that it was Mrs. Boevey, the Portia of the New Atlantis and a woman of note in her day. Whether they are right or wrong matters very little; but it is a sign of our own literary times, when everything is sooner or later accounted for in print, that a volume weighing five pounds and three-quarters, and measuring superficially twelve inches by ten, has been compiled to answer the question once more with every circumstance of fulness. The title explains that the old theory is maintained: The "Perverse Widow": Being Passages from the Life of Catherina, wife of William Boevey, Esq., of Flaxley Abbey, in the County of Gloucester.

Sir Roger first met his Fair Cruelty, it will be remembered, during his opening term of office as sheriff. She certainly had the finest hand of any woman in the world, and the baronet's heart was hers in a trice. Also she was a reading lady, and far gone in the pleasures of friendship, and such a desperate scholar that no country gentleman could approach her without being a jest. Sir Roger was utterly discomfited in her presence, and yet—and yet—"I have been credibly informed that—but who can believe half that is said?—after she had done speaking to me, she put her hand" (it was certainly the finest hand of any woman in the world) "to her bosom, and adjusted her tucker." Rumour also credited her with calling Sir Roger "the tamest and most humane of all the brutes in the country." During the progress of his suit Sir Roger patched the western door of his stables with the pads of foxes; for "whenever the widow was cruel the foxes were sure to pay for it." But it was all in vain. For forty years he loved her without return, and when he died he bequeathed to her a great pearl necklace, and a couple of silver bracelets set with jewels.

So much for the Perverse Widow of the realms of fiction, where, indeed, we personally are very willing to keep her. If Mr. Crawley-Boevey is to be believed, and he certainly has made out a good case, the Perverse Widow of fact, Mrs. Catherine Boevey, was a woman of remarkable intelligence and influence. She lies beneath a monument in Westminster Abbey, where a tribute to her memory may be read. Among her chief claims to remembrance is her share in founding the festival of the three choirs at Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester. She also, as we have said, figured in the New Atlantis as a virtuous dame, a very notable distinction. A portrait of Mrs. Boevey serves as frontispiece to this volume, but by a sad misfortune we are denied a sight of the finest hand of any woman in the world. Besides the matter to the immediate point, Mr. Crawley-Boevey enters exhaustively into the genealogy of families connected with his own. But we cannot help thinking that a little essay in portable form would have answered the purpose of the general reader far better.

In Search of Gold.

Sand and Spinifex. By the Hon. David W. Carnegie.
(C. A. Pearson.)

WHAT is spinifex? Mr. Carnegie, who is a younger son of the Earl of Southesk, says he does not know its right name. It is called by some "porcupine grass"—a good name, surely; others murmur Festuca irritans, and shudder. The name of the plant is obscure to hundreds of men who know its characteristics right well. Spinifex covers the West Australian wildernesses among which the aborigines roam from water-hole to water-hole. It grows in hummocks; it pricks the feet of men and camels horribly; and it is useful in only two ways: it binds the sand, and for three weeks in the year its bloom makes excellent forage. Mr. Carnegie and his party saw, while exploring the West Australian wastes for gold, more sand and spinifex than anything else; hence the appropriateness of the title of this book, which is the record of five years' pioneering and exploration in Western Australia.

In his early chapters Mr. Carnegie gives us graphic pictures of Coolgardie in the great "rush" of the early nineties. Thither Mr. Carnegie went in September, 1892, with Lord Percy Douglas (now Lord Douglas of Hawick), in time to see and take part in the "rush to Hannan's." "Oh, glorious uncertainty of mining!" he exclaims, recalling those days, and he tells us that one of the "poor devils" whom he saw with hardly a rag to his back "has now a considerable fortune, with rooms in a fashionable quarter of London, and in frock-coat and tall-hat 'swells' it with the best!" A grievous contrast to the Hannan rush was the rush to "Siberia": but, at least, it enabled Mr. Carnegie to write a vivid description of the symptoms and scenes of a "rush" in a mining town:

Once clear of the town, what a strange collection of baggage animals, horses, camels, and donkeys! What a mass of carts, drays, buggies, wheelbarrows, handbarrows, and many queer makeshifts for carrying goods—the strangest of all a large barrel set on an axle, and dragged or shoved by means of two long handles, the proud possessor's belongings turning round and round inside until they must surely be charred into a most confusing jumble. Then we see the "swagman" with his load on his back, perhaps fifty pounds of provisions rolled up in blankets, with a pick and shovel strapped on them, and in either hand a gallon bag of water. No light work this with the thermometer standing at 100° in the shade, and the track inches deep in fine, powdery dust; and yet men start off with a light heart, with perhaps a two hundred mile journey before them, replenishing their bundles as they pass through camps on their road.

Mr. Carnegie cared little for financial schemes or humdrum mining, and accordingly he joined in one prospecting expedition after another. The expeditions were conducted with camels and horses, or with camels alone, and progress depended on the water supply, which was sometimes perilously small and infrequent. The cream of the book is the narrative of a prospecting expedition into a vast unknown tract of Western Australia, the crossing of which meant a thousand miles of bee-line travelling between Coolgardie and Kimberley. Mr. Carnegie prepares us for this narrative by a glowing apologia of the prospector's life and aims. We cannot even summarise the events in this great expedition undertaken by this picked band of explorers. They had all the fun and all the hardship they looked for, but the results in the way of gold-finding were nil. Mr. Carnegie cheerfully confesses on the 433rd page of his book that "my work has had no better result than to demonstrate to others that part of the interior that may best be avoided." To that result must be added this excellent book. In the wilderness the party could not fail to meet parties of the aborigines; and we will conclude by quoting a dramatic passage in this connexion. One day the party approached unseen, with all their camels and baggage, to within one hundred yards of an encampment. Mr. Carnegie thus describes the meeting:

No words can describe the look of terror and amazement on the faces of those wild savages. Spellbound they crouched in the black and smouldering ashes of the spinifex, mouths open and eyes staring, and then with one terrific yell away they ran, dodging and doubling until a somewhat bushy tufwood tree seemed to offer them means of escape. How many there had been I do not know, but the tree harboured three, the man, woman, and child, that we had first singled out. . . . Even to European eyes a camel is not the commonest of beasts, and since these people had never seen an animal larger than a dingo, and, indeed, no animal save this and the spinifex rat, their surprise may well be imagined on seeing a thing as large as their whole camp marching solemnly along. Putting down the caravan we approached them, and from a mad, incoherent yelling their protestations gradually died down to an occasional gulp like that of a naughty child.

Of such scenes there are not a few in Mr. Carnegie's interesting pages.

Notes on New Books. Travel.

THE GREAT SALT LAKE TRAIL.

BY W. F. CODY AND H. INMAN.

In this book, written by Colonel Henry Inman and Colonel William F. Cody ("Buffalo Bill") in collaboration, we plunge into "the era of the trapper, the scout, the savage, and the passage of emigrants to the goldfields of California when the only route was by the overland trail." It is a period beloved of boys, who know it through the heightened descriptions of yellow-back writers. Yet in these pages the yellow-back writers are again and again justified in their descriptions, which are not more thrilling than the facts. Take the Pony Express, organised in 1860 to carry letters to and from the Californian goldfields:

It was no easy duty; horse and human flesh were strained to the limit of physical tension. Day or night, in sunshine or in storm, under the darkest skies, in the pale moonlight, and with only the stars at times to guide him, the brave rider must speed on. Rain, hail, snow, or sleet, there was no delay; his precious burden of letters demanded his best efforts under the stern necessities of the hazardous service; it brooked no detention; on he must ride. Sometimes his pathway led across level prairies, straight as the flight of an arrow. It was oftener a zigzag trail hugging the bank of awful precipices, and dark, narrow cañons infested with watchful savages eager for the scalp of the daring man who had the temerity to enter their mountain fastnesses.

The Indian passages in this book are even more fascinating with their stories of blood and treachery; or you may turn to the story of the famous Kit Carson, and sigh for such a life as his. The book is admirably illustrated, and gives us Fennimore Cooper's world in its "last sprightly runnings." (Macmillan. 10s. 6d.)

FROM PEKIN TO PETERSBURG.

BY ARNOT REID.

Mr. Arnot Reid travelled overland from Pekin to Petersburg because he wished to reach Europe by a route which he had not before traversed. It was as though a man should go to Manchester by the Midland Railway because he was a little weary of the London and North-Western. Nor does Mr. Reid profess to be an explorer or traveller in the professional sense. "I am the average indoors man," he says, with engaging frankness. His friends warned him against the journey, but he had a mind to take it, and he did, and finished it in the time he had allowed himself—fifty days. It cost Mr. Reid and his small party about a pound a day per head. We cannot attempt to summarise Mr. Reid's journey through Chinese territory, across the Desert of Gobi, and through Siberia; but we can say without hesitation that his narrative is interesting in every page. Mr. Reid deals with the missionary question with equal outspokenness and care. "There is, humanly speaking, no probability of Christianising China." That is his opinion, but he puts it a little less abruptly when he gives the impressions he received in a stay of two days in a missionary family:

Apart from the memory of great kindness and great helpfulness, the stay left upon my mind a double impression. To anyone doubting whether missionary effort in China is advisable, the impression produced would be to confirm that doubt. To anyone believing it rally that it is the clear duty of Christians to go into all the world and preach the Gospel, the impression produced would be a desire to help still further those people who are conscientiously, zealously, and nobly seeking to fulfil that duty.

In conclusion, Mr. Reid commends the idea of a Protected China to the English-speaking races—in a word, an Anglo-American Protectorate is his ideal. Alas! the Anglo-American Commission adjourned on Monday—sine die—on the question of an Alaskan boundary. (Arnold. 7s. 6d.)

ROUND THE WORLD ON A WHEEL.

BY J. F. FRASER.

This book is, at any rate, unique—that is to say, it is the only record of "a bicycle ride of nineteen thousand, two hundred, and thirty-seven miles, through seventeen countries and across three continents"; and to write anything new is an achievement. The riders—they were three in all: the author, Mr. S. E. Luun, and Mr. F. H. Lowe—travelled east from England and returned from the west, and it took them seven hundred and seventy-four days to put their pneumatic girdle round the globe. This was longer than Puck, but then his girdle was not pneumatic. The principal value of the narrative is its truthfulness, for Mr. Fraser is no maker of literature, and we do not gather from his pages that the travellers departed far from the norm in their personalities. Such is the increasing friendliness of the world and the humanising effect of a prank that their unpleasant adventures were few and trifling. Indeed, Mr. Fraser admits that they were nearer death on their return ride through London streets than at any other time. No one seems to be so assured of longevity as the professional hairbreadth-escaper. (Methuen. 6s.)

Science.

BIRDS.

BY A. H. EVANS.

This is the new volume of that excellent series, "The Cambridge Natural History." It is a large octavo volume of more than six hundred pages, containing a great many wood-block presentations of English and foreign birds. Mr. Evans's aim has been to beat once comprehensive and scientific, and to produce a book useful to the tyro, the traveller, and the more or less trained ornithologist. On p. 329 we have an interesting drawing of the Dodo—a miracle of ugliness and ineffectual wings. And here is the condensed natural history of this detail of the day-before-yesterday:

The Dodo is said to have inhabited forests, to have swallowed pebbles, to have uttered a cry like that of a gosling, and to have laid one large white egg on a mass of grass. Hogs and other imported animals seem to have conduced to its extermination, as well as the hand of man.

The book is, of course, admirably produced; it is interesting to notice how completely wood-engraving holds its own in this class of illustration. (Macmillan. 17s. net.)

VOLCANOES.

BY PROF. T. G. BONNEY.

A question interesting to child and man is answered by Prof. Bonney, in his new contribution to the admirable Progressive Science Series. Whence comes the immense eruptive force of a volcano? The longer a volcano preserves its outward calm the more violent is its next outbreak, while, per contra, volcanoes like Stromboli, which are always active, are rarely explosive. Steam—just steam—supplies the force with which a volcano throws up lava, rocks, ashes, or mud; it is as though a kettle had boiled over. "Every explosion, every discharge of projectiles, is accompanied by a jet of steam, like the firing of some monstrous gun." The scale on which steam is sometimes generated in the crater of a volcano may be gathered from the following facts:

M. Fouqué, who studied an eruption of Etna in 1865, made a number of observations in order to measure the quantity of water which was discharged from the vent in the form of steam. Each explosion, he estimated, ejected about seventy-nine cubic yards of water in this condition, and one of these occurred on an average every four minutes for about 100 days. That is to say, the discharge amounted to 2,829,600 cubic yards of water. Moreover, this does not adequately express the quantity emitted from the volcano, for a lateral crater was the focus of this eruption, and the one at the summit also emitted great quantities of steam.

This is the answer to a somewhat elementary question. The ultimate causes of "vulcanicity"—as the action of volcanoes is called—are still to seek. But Prof. Bonney is able to write: "I am sanguine that, to borrow an appropriate phrase from a child's game, 'we are getting warm,' and that our successors, by the end of the first quarter of the coming century, will have got much nearer to the solution of the problem." (Murray. 7s. 6d.)

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE.

BY J. ARTHUR THOMSON.

The "Victorian Era" series, of which this is a new volume, has a refreshing elasticity. Here we have an historical sketch of the evolution of the science of biology. The preceding volume was a monograph on Charles Kingsley, the next will be a monograph of Tennyson, and after that will come accounts of our Foreign Missions and a history of Indian life and thought since the Mutiny. Mr. Thomson's contribution was by no means the simplest. To put into such concise form the achievements merely of Darwin and Weismann would have been difficult; but here we have a capable and readable survey of the whole field, with all its principal labourers, from Aristotle onwards. Mr. Thomson dedicates his work to Hæckel. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)

Verse.

MILESTONES.

BY FRANCES BANNERMAN.

A collection of poems in many keys. There are love poems and philosophic poems and romantic poems; and all are quiet and reserved, though none are strikingly good. All are above the average, and the book is an interesting reflection of a modern temperament. We quote for its literary association these lines on the intruder who interrupted Coleridge in the transcription of his "Kubla Khan" dream:

THE MAN FROM PORLOCK.

Person from Porlock, nameless man,
If it were known, how execrate your name!
Who to our endless loss of "Kubla Khan"
Upon your dull and trivial business came,
And scattered all the golden store of dreams
Lent by the poet's visions of the night,
That now as Tantalus' own torment gleams
Elusive, but a fragment of delight;
Nor may we hear the Abyssinian maid
Sing to her dulcimer that unknown song.
That on the poet's sleep such glamour laid
With spells that to the circling spheres belong.

To bear us with him where for ever runs
The sacred river of tumultuous streams,
Lit by no changeful moons, no changeless suns,
Through all the land of witchery and dreams.

Though long in kirkyard rest is laid
The man from Porlock, whose gross ear
Heard not the Abyssinian maid—
Though he is dead this many a year—
He leaves behind an endless brood
Dull as himself, importunate—
Always too soon do they intrude,
And always go too late!

Miss Bannermann's verses make a very pretty book. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

Theology.

MESSIAH COMETH.

BY GEORGE EDWARD JELF.

"That Israel may be saved" is the hope and prayer that from the infancy of the Church has been breathed by followers of Christ. The appeal to the Hebrew Sacred Scriptures has produced a vast body of controversial literature, and it is hardly conceivable that at this time any grave argument should be still hidden between those fretted leaves. The warm approval of Rabbi Ben-Oliel, quoted in the preface to this book, does not suggest that Canon Jelf, at any rate, has discovered any new analogy of compelling exactness between the types and prophecies of the Old Testament and the facts recorded in the Gospels. But if a re-statement of the case was necessary, it could hardly have been made clearer or more exhaustive than that which is to be found here; while the writer's tone of sincere conviction and earnest piety should win for him, if anything might, an unprejudiced hearing from those whom he principally addresses. (A. D. Innes. 7s. 6d.)

THE TABERNACLE.

BY WILLIAM BROWN.

It is "in relation to Christ and the Church" that Mr. Brown unfolds his subject. It would have been better, perhaps, to rest content with the archaeological aspect of the matter, for the author's moral and theological comparisons are not striking. If the "fal-lals and gewgaws of Aaron's old wardrobe" (to quote Milton's acid phrase) are to find an antitype, it must be in the ritual rather than in the doctrine of the Christian Church. In that which constitutes the valuable portion of his treatise—the painful reconstruction of the migratory fane—Mr. Brown's work is worthy of high praise. It is a task that has furnished occasion for diligent ingenuity, and the author has not been found wanting. The Tabernacle and its rites were a thing of beauty; to have restored them to our comprehension is to have established a claim upon our gratitude. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. New Edition. 3s. 6d.)

Miscellaneous.

THE WORKS OF SILVER. EDITED BY C. G. R. MATTHEY.

George Silver's "Paradoxes of Defence" (1599) is a treatise on swordmanship, and a commentary thereon that has not before been published, "Brief Instructions upon My Paradoxes of Defence," are here printed together in one volume with a preface, by a practical swordsman, who subjects Silver's theories to criticism, and evidently intends the result to be studied by modern gladiators. This being so, it seems to us that some modernisation of Silver's spelling would have been wise, for your gladiator is seldom enough of a man of letters to want long s's, v's for u's, and other sixteenth century typographical peculiarities, in his manuals. But for literary students the reprint will have much quaint charm. (Bell. 21s.)

LANDMARKS IN INDUSTRIAL HISTORY. BY G. F. WARNER.

Mr. Warner gives an excellent outline of the leading facts of English industrial history. The chief features of particular developments of industry or commerce are grouped under nineteen heads, including "The Manorial System," "The Mercantile System," "The Trading Companies," "Machinery and Power," "Trade and the Flag." The Free Trade Movement is curiously placed under "Remedies by Legislation." An arrangement by epochs has an undoubted attraction for the general reader and the unlaborious student. Perhaps more attention might have been devoted to emigration and colonisation in the present century, while the last chapter might have been made more useful by a brief account of proposals for an Imperial customs union. There is a good index to this mass of well-digested information. (Blackie.)

Dr. Isaac Taylor has put forth, through Mr. Edward Arnold, a new and cheaper edition of his learned work, The History of the Alphabet, first published sixteen years ago. The author points with satisfaction to the fact that several novel theories which he enunciated in the first edition, especially those relating to the origin of the Glagolitic Alphabet and of the Runes, have not been opposed. The second edition of Prof. Edwin R. A. Seligman's work, The Shifting and Incidence of Taxation (Macmillan), is practically a new volume, alterations and additions having been introduced freely.

To the pocket edition of the Waverley novels Mr. Dent has added St. Ronan's Well.

Fiction.

Rupert Armstrong. By O. Shakespear.
(Harper & Brothers.)

THIS novel is scarcely strong, but it is sane and just, and it well deserves to be called charming. It is full of delicate perceptions and appreciations, especially of human character when under the influence of art. The atmosphere of the story is exclusively artistic. Sir Rupert was a great painter; that is to say, he was a popular painter, and might have been a great one had he chosen. His history is told by his daughter Agatha, who, more fortunate than most tellers of tales in the first person, contrives to limn her own portrait convincingly. Be it said that the portrait is dignified and beautiful. Only three people knew that Sir Rupert had sold his soul for fame and money—Agatha, Sir Rupert himself, and their friend Maurice Wootton. And it was Agatha who aroused Sir Rupert's somnolent conscience—that conscience whose awakening ended in so moving a tragedy.

"Father, can't you go back again and paint as you did then?"

My words seemed to move him.

"One can't ever go back; to regret is the biggest of follies, and a cowardice too."

"I wonder," I said, "if the regret of Adam and Eve for Paradise were a folly or a cowardice! If we have once walked with God, can we go from His presence and forget? I believe you remember in flashes while you are painting these things you do now."

... He looked at me a moment with something like fear in his astonishment. ...

"What have you heard about me?" he said. ...

"I have heard very little," said I. "Only that you began life with a high ideal of painting, and did some beautiful pictures. . . ."

"Some people say I still paint beautiful pictures," he answered, in the tone of one demanding justice.

"You live among people whose object it is to make you think so."

"You are still almost a child," said he. "Who has been putting these ideas into your head?"

"They are ideas that have grown there of themselves. About you I simply know, because I love you."

Sir Rupert did go back, and the effort cost him not only his hand's skill, but his life.

We are rather puzzled to know why Miss Shakespear has called her novel Rupert Armstrong. Sir Rupert's story does not emerge from the greyness of background till near the close of the book, while the love story of Maurice Wootton and Clare Wentworth is salient from beginning to end, and at least as well done. All the people are drawn with distinction. Agatha is perhaps the most effective portrait, and next to her must stand her lovely and soulless mother, Lady Armstrong, at whose bidding Sir Rupert became "popular." Beyond doubt Miss Shakespear's best novel, Rupert Armstrong discloses possibilities in its author of which we had not hitherto suspected the existence.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

BY WILSON BARRETT AND
THE DAUGHTERS OF BABYLON. ROBERT HICHENS.

THIS Mr. Barrett is really the actor, and this Mr. Hichens really the author of The Green Carnation, and their collaboration is a fact, and a very capable one. The style of the book is approximately Biblical, and the story is the story that the stage already knows. (Macqueen. 6s.)

JANE TREACHEL. BY HAMILTON AÏDÉ.

A novelist of the old school, the author of Poet and Peer and Penruddocke here makes a re-appearance. To read Mr. Aïdé is to recapture one's youth. "The World asked, 'Who is Miss Vincent?'" and the answer did not satisfy that great critic and busybody." People do not write like that now. The story is of upper circles and mystery: a melodrama in evening dress. Mr. Aïdé states that he has already made a stage version of it. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

THE HEART OF DENISE. BY S. LEVETT YEATS.

In the Chevalier d'Auriac Mr. Yeats achieved a good romantic novel of its type. Here we are among chevaliers and vicomtes of the Court of Henri of Navarre. Denise tells her own story and—to the author's credit—she tells it admirably. We are at once prepossessed (if she is not) in favour of M. de Loignac, Lieutenant of the Guard, who was "poor as a homeless cat, his patrimony, as we heard, being but a sword and a ruined tower somewhere in the Corrèze." The other stories in the book are shorter, and are laid mostly in India. (Longmans. 6s.)

TWO MEN O' MENDIP. BY WALTER RAYMOND.

THIS story by the author of Tryphena in Love is full of the fragrance of Zummerzetshire. There is suffering and homely philosophy and gladness such as country folk know. "Father and daughter jogged along together high up on the open down, with the brown heather for a mile or more on each hand, and the broad valley rich and green stretching far away below. White homesteads gleamed between the orchards and elm trees, and beyond the distant hills a narrow strip of sea glistened in the sun. Then, as they passed over the brow and began to pick their way down the steep road, they could look down upon a nest of thatched roofs and see people gathering on the village green. 'Shipham,' said Solomon." (Longmans. 6s.)

LONE PINE.

BY R. B. TOWNSHEND.

"To my friends in Santiago, red and white, and in memory of a brindled bulldog"—that is Mr. Townshend's dedication. The Santiago is not the famous one, but a township in New Mexico, and the story is of Americans, Spaniards, and Indians. "The Red Indian has often been represented as apathetic," says the author. "He is not. His loves and hatreds are intense." In Lone Pine we have testimony to this, and a variety of such excitement as tales of "greasers" always give. A masculine book. (Methuen. 6s.)

MANY WAYS OF LOVE.

BY FRED WHISHAW.

The many ways of love were those in vogue in the Court and times of Catherine the Great of Russia. Early in the story the heroine, who is the narrator, is entangled in a briar bush and released by the hero, who, to her remark that her dress will be torn, replies: "Ha! ha! there speaks the thrifty German fraulein. I like it; I am half German myself, and the other half wicked, extravagant English. Now, see, my thrifty German half says: 'Spare the dress and detach, by slow labour and many pricks, the thorns.' My English half cries: 'Perish slow labour and all thrift, and let the skirt go! I think the English in me preponderates; I will cut!'" A good, breezy novel of love and intrigue and fighting. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)

OFF THE HIGH ROAD.

BY ELEANOR C. PRICE.

"Will any kind people, living quietly off the high road, receive a person in serious trouble, homeless and friendless?" That advertisement is the kernel of the story. Mrs. Downes and her daughter Jessie became the kind people, and their guest was of the highest importance to the development of the drama. A quiet country book in the main, with more emotion than action, and continuous interest. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE PROCESSION OF LIFE.

BY H. A. VACHELL.

A Californian story, full of local character and colour. "California," we read, "is like a girl just out—a flutter with self-consciousness. . . . She has many suitors, but will she choose the right man? . . . The fellow to whom she is at present engaged is a sorry money-grabber, who will desert her when her gold becomes his." (Sands. 6s.)

JOCK'S WARD.

BY MRS. HERBERT MARTIN.

In the beginning Ezra Dunstan, one of the Peculiar People, is charged with manslaughter for permitting his child to die without a doctor's assistance, and is sentenced to imprisonment. Whereupon a shrill voice cried: "A blarsted shyme, too! How durs' you gi' 'im six months—'im as wouldn't 'arm a bloomin' babby!" That was Jock. Subsequently Dunstan came out, and Jock—who plays the part of Benignancy tempered with Whitechapel—takes him under his wing. A pretty, if somewhat mechanical, street story. (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

THE DESIRE OF THEIR HEARTS.

BY MARGARET PARKER.

Miss Parker is an Australian novelist, and her latest story will please those who like a novel to be tender, and wholesome, and neither too sad nor too happy in its ending. We like the heroine none the less when she gives up her idea of painting "that long series of Tennyson's women whose pictures she has already sketched in her own mind." (Jarrold. 6s.)

CICELY VAUGHAN.

BY PHILIP DAVENANT.

Cicely is thirty and unhappy, so unhappy that the first thing she does in Chapter II. is to bore a hole in the bottom of a pleasure boat with her penknife. Presently she is lying on the river bank. Although she had "gone down for the last time," Cicely talks at large to her rescuer for two pages about religion and etiquette. Asked if she can walk, she replies: "I can walk if you will help me; but it's far, and perhaps I shall be taking you out of your way" (she had just taken him to the bottom of the river). He tells her: "I am Stephen Fenwick"; whereupon the would-be-drowned young lady remembers it is her birthday, and that "You are to have the privilege of taking me in to dinner to-night." (Long. 6s.)

THE CURÉ OF ST. PHILIPPE.

BY FRANCIS W. GREY.

This "Story of French-Canadian Politics" opens with the appointment of the new curé of St. Ephrem du Mile End, and resolves itself into a series of discussions on church-building, schools, protective tariffs, water and drainage, party intrigues—everything, in fact, that one does not want in a novel and does not love in a blue-book. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

FRANK REDLAND, RECRUIT. BY MRS. COULSON KERNAHAN.

By the author of Trewinnot of Guy's. Here, however, are no medical students; the story is a domestic drama, with a choleric Squire (who cut off his port for twelve months, on an average, once a week) as a prominent figure. "If Frank Redland was a fool," says the author, "he was at least a handsome one, with his frank smile, merry brown eyes, and fair hair." This description should endear him to the sex which reads novels. The story is conventional in manner and more interesting than many. (Long. 6s.)

WICKED ROSAMOND.

BY MINA SANDEMAN.

The adjective is unnecessary, Rosamond's wickedness being patent. Her attempt to murder her husband by means of a poisoned pair of gloves supplied to her by a music-hall lady, from a recipe of Catherine de Medici, has only to be mentioned. A story of a perverted nature, compact of unpleasant and incredible incidents. A cure for good spirits. (Long. 6s.)

FRANÇOIS THE VALET.

BY G. W. APPLETON.

A slangy story of mystery and crime. "'By Jove!'" said Jimmie, 'there's a bit of romance for you; and you'd scatter your silly old brains about Ogilvie's carpet, would you?'" There is a place in the book called Addlehead, and a girl is "folded" to Hubert's breast. But the author is high-spirited and extremely pleased with his story. (Pearson. 6s.)

MARY UNWIN.

BY ALAN ST. AUBYN.

The heroine of this story, by the author of A Fellow of Trinity, has nothing to do with Cowper's friend. The new Mary Unwin is a vicar's daughter. Throughout the book the course of true love runs roughly, and duns are continually at the door-bell; but then, just in time, Mary unexpectedly becomes a rich man's heiress, and all is well. There are pictures. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

ACCESSORY AFTER THE FACT.

BY MRS. LEITH ADAMS.

There is nothing on the title-page of this book to show that it is not a continuous novel. Yet the title covers only the first of nine stories, or about one-fifteenth part of the book. This is not commendable. (Digby, Long & Co. 6s.)

THE RECORDS OF VINCENT TRILL.

BY DICK DONOVAN.

Sixteen cases in which Vincent Trill aids sixteen laurels to "the many he had earned," and proves himself, to the author's satisfaction, to be "the shrewdest and cleverest detective of his time." (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

The Encore.

THE artist was playing the Fantasia of Schumann, where-through, as Schlegel's translator hath it, "there runs a note whose gentle tone Is heard aright by him alone Who lists with care extreme."

"I have often triod," said the giggling woman behind me, "to get her to wear the usual things; but she's obstinate in her way."

The chivalrous man beside her who kept one polite ear for the giggle and borrowed the other occasionally for the music, was distressed by the sforzandos which seemed to hammer indecorously at the concrete mass within him which he mistook for the door of a delicate imagination.

"Wants sympathy; is a bit hard," he was heard to murmur.

In front of me the joke was evidently intense, though its contraband nature could be guessed from the startled blush on the face of the girl in shimmering green. It was a face that a photographer would have tilted, imparting to it the witchery of silly innocence: one might have pursued and lost the well-beloved a dozen times in an hour's scrutiny of its pretty colouring under lifted eyebrows, its paltry, vulgar mirth, its defiant yet pathetic embarrassment in detection. By her side was a girl in stripes of black who might have sat for Demureness personified. Her teeth and lips retreated as before some bullying kiss; an indolent gentleness shone from her. Yet it was from her that proceeded the mirth-extorting glance which made the girl in green turn her head to the right, suffocating with the torment and delight of repressed laughter.

The singer was their quarry. She had come on in a pink satin skirt, answering shimmer for shimmer to the garb of the girl in green. Her small contralto seemed drowned in the loud chord of colour.

The artist was playing in modo duna leggendario; a legend of long ago when a man whose elated soul heard and rehearsed the melodies of an authentic optimism clouded and subtilised them, at his own whim made them harsh or delicate, thorned them with difficulties, forbad them to speak outright, and by allegiance to his own magical temperament eluded the understanding of the crowd.

The chivalrous listener grew sheepishly dissatisfied with his equivocal position. He continued to acquiesce, however, with the rippling fatness beside him which exuded criticism of the artist's bare arms: it was penetrating into the arcana of Art to sit next someone who had helped the singer to make up and could discuss the factitious merits of her eyebrows and complexion.

His conscience voiced an extenuating word: "She's a fine pianist."

A muffled peal from the girl in green, backed by a glint in the eyes of her demure companion, who was gloating with secret relish over her perfidious disdain of music, rebuked him. It was a triple forte, representing to them mere piano-banging, which inspired their mirth. Earnest and self-possessed, thinking of nothing but music, the artist subsided on the common chord of C, and a sound of applause broke forth.

"She hasn't done yet," said the chivalrous man.

Somehow at this moment one knew him entirely. He had helped to rob us of Schumann, but he had disclosed himself. He was the typical sportsman: length was tedious, but great length was record-breaking, worth backing. He was in sympathy with Miss B.—she was beating the others.

The clarity of the triumphal march brought about no perceptible alleviation of the amused puzzlement of the faces around me; for a moment I was blind to them.

The fantastic, tripping passages of short notes, a sealed mystery to undedicated fingers, seemed to liberate space as though before fairy feet the stolid walls receded, amplifying the room for the roving fancy, creating avenues of open doors, mellowing and vivifying the prodigious luminosity of the gilded room and dissolving the fixed stuffiness of the air.

Before me the demure girl convinced herself of delicacy by yawning into her palm.

The peroration came: for me suddenly, tamely. Human life, so persistent in its obtrusion, so determined not to refrain from exhibiting its most characteristic gestures or eclipse its imperious geniality for any music of God or man, dulled me to the happenings of the tone-world.

The end came, I say. Whereupon the chivalrous man said: "We ought to give her an encore, I think." And they did! These bored listeners, these clandestine gossips, these critics of clothes, deliberately protracted their sufferings, deliberately asked for one more message from that world of tone-poetry whose language meant nothing to them. And in the benediction of their amazing patronage, across the endless gulf that separates the artist's soul from the painstaking imitation of one, Schumann's interpreter bowed and withdrew.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. GASTON DESCHAMPS in the Temps laments the deplorable mediocrity of contemporary literature and the dearth of masterpieces. "Never were masterpieces so rare as at this present moment. Nearly every place is to be taken. The retreat of a worn-out dilettantism, the abdication of a blatant and impotent pornography, open up illimitable perspectives to all the young people who still desire to make us listen to a word of certitude or reveal to us a mystery of beauty." M. Deschamps does not take into account the fact that literature to-day in France is a matter of comparative insignificance. This is not precisely the moment to clamour for masterpieces when a whole country is living in a thrilling sensational serial, when our sole preoccupation lying down at night is the expectation of the next morning's sensation. Demoralised as we all are here by much futile reading of newspapers, much futile impassioned talk, who is to find leisure and silence for the composition of masterpieces? The writers themselves have left their libraries and gone down into the arena, where some of them, alas! are cutting very lamentable figures indeed. M. Jules Lemaitre, so witty and amazingly clever till now, is furnishing us with proof that the wittiest man of letters may be a complete nin-compoop, and that the man who can talk delightfully about books may not always be relied upon to talk of public matters with sense or decency.

One accomplished literary tradesman of my acquaintance alone has preserved his head in the general loss of reason, not to his credit will I own. For this absolute sacrifice of every personal and private interest to the great question of the hour reveals the permanent chivalry and disinterestedness that may be looked for in French character. When asked his opinion on the "Affaire," my worthy trader in books and articles replied, in terms befitting a spirit so properly commercial as his: "All I know about the miserable business is, that literature is at a standstill."

It is a satisfaction to find that Gyp has been able to snatch a few odd moments from her embittered pursuit of the Jews, and her deadly feud with the partisans of Truth and Justice, to write a bright and amusing booklet—Monsieur de Folleuil. It is the thousandth repetition of Gyp, always the same dialogued attack upon society and foreigners, always and inevitably an exposure of Gyp's amiable contempt of the nations of the world and unauthentic titles. She seems to regard foreigners as Jews. Both inspire her with loathing and aversion. An innocent preference for afternoon tea provokes her scorn, because it is an English habit. Gyp's war cry is France for the French! She would expel all foreigners, all Protestants and Jews. She maintains that French national character is essentially Catholic, that a French Protestant is an anomaly, an absurdity, and, in consequence, as something supremely anti-national, his existence justifies his persecution.

The opening dialogues of Monsieur de Folleuil treat wittily and with ferocious contempt of the appalling and unforgettable catastrophe of the Bazar de Charité. Folleuil returns from a long search for his cousin's servant, who, having left the Bazar, rushed back into the flames to the rescue of the victims.

"I say," remarks the old marchioness, a delightful old Frenchwoman, who has a tongue, and knows how to use it, "except the servants, and a few admirable exceptions, they weren't very chic, the men! There were not many dead or wounded among the men?"

"There were only about two hundred at the Bazar, they say," replies a young man.

"So much the better," says the old marchioness. "If there had been more all the women would have been burnt."

She is still more pitiless in the next dialogue—Revirement:

"I hear my nephew behaved like a cad," she remarks to Folleuil.

"Mon Dieu! every one can't be a hero," Folleuil says.

"I mightn't have done better."

"You would have walked off, and never looked behind you."

"Certainly not; but I might, perhaps, not have accomplished any sensational rescue."

"They say that my nephew escaped, knocking down every one in his way with unheard-of brutality."

"Yes, that is what they did say; but now," he explains, "somebody having hit upon the new and profound idea that it is more meritorious to raise than to follow the current, everybody rushed to do it, and then, you see, this frankness was very awkward. Society is shaky enough, without striking another blow at it."

It is a pity, he admits, that the men were not, if not heroes, at least gentlemen; but he thinks it better to stick to the new version, and tone facts down. A lady of dubious title enters, and begins to deplore the abominable campaign against the men, which attacks the aristocracy. The old marchioness maintains that the campaign is justifiable since the men behaved abominably. Mme. de Rirfray begins:

"Among the men I know who were at the Bazar when the fire —"

Folleuil interrupts her: "What, you know men who were there when the fire broke out! You are lucky!"

She, laughing: "They were there that very day, and even a part of next day; but by 4 o'clock it was all over. There was nobody. They had all gone away half-an-hour before the fire began, or arrived five minutes afterwards. But I know about fifteen who were really there."

Folleuil: "What! You know fifteen men who were at the Bazar? It's like the man's drill. He bought it for a hunting suit, and he was assured that in the wash it only shrank three mètres in a piece of sixty; but when it was washed he found he had fallen precisely on the very three mètres that shrank, just as you fell on the fifteen men who were at the Bazar."

Not for nothing does Gyp bear the name of Mirabeau. She does not spare her own class any more than her neighbours.

Things Seen.

The Flock.

ÆONS ago the receding sea had left the hill town three miles inland, and on the pastures thus reclaimed black cattle grazed, rushes waved, and tiny channels of water felt for their level among the sand-hills. When the sun shone it was as if those pastures, that the sea and the world had alike forgotten, said: "Our new clothes—are they not gay?" for the waters sparkled, and the rushes changed in the breeze from grey to silver. By night, from a window in the hill town, I could see beyond the dim pastures the lights of the great ships going on—always going on; by day I could see the shepherds busy with their flocks, and the burly little tramp steamers pushing their way up the river that coiled through the pastures. At sunset the level rays of the sun sparkled on the white stone quay half-way up the river where the tramp steamers unloaded—sparkled, too, in the solitary window of a hut—a mission chapel, so I had been told—perched on a sand dune behind the quay. Never a Sunday evening passed but a man, old, thin, eager, his coat-tails flying, left the town, descended the hill, and strode across the pastures, that the sea and the world had forgotten, to the hut perched on the sand dune behind the quay. When I asked who formed his congregation, they replied: "O, just the sailors of the tramp steamers." Came an evening, a cruel evening, when mist rose from the marshes, when rain drove across the pastures and the wind blew. On that evening I, ever curious in such matters, followed the old, eager man. And, after an hour's buffeting with the elements, I came alongside the hut—and entered. The altar was a deal table covered with a sail, discoloured by a thousand storms. Above the altar was a board, and roughly carved upon it was this plea: "When all else declines, let the noontide of Thy grace and peace remain." By the side of the altar sat the preacher, and the room contained one other person. There we three waited, while about us the elements screamed, and whistled, and hooted. At length the preacher rose. "The sacrifices of God," he began mechanically, "are a broken spirit." The wind howled. He paused, looking sorrowfully around the room; suddenly the shadows left his face, his eyes gleamed, and, bending forward, with outstretched arms, he cried aloud the thought that had come to him: "Where two or three are gathered together in My name—" he murmured. The rest was lost in the wind, but the old man's lips moved on.

Youth.

It was Ruskin's birthday, and I chose for the place of my meditation the Turner Room at the National Gallery. In the midst of the wide floor I stood, surrounded by the masterpieces of the greatest of English landscape painters. There was the life history of a genius, of an art, displayed in rows three deep upon the spacious walls. Work so diverse that taken severally you might have declared of this and that picture that, from whatever hands they came into being, certainly they were not the work of one. Here the gulf was bridged, and by multiple gradations the fruit of one man's infinite diligence manifested its essential unity. By dint of frequenting the place for many years I have become wise about some of these canvases.

I had been sitting there for a quarter of an hour before the dazzling sun and sea, "Ulysses deriding Polyphomus," when a couple of ladies strayed through the entrance. A girl of four-and-twenty, the elder; she brought with her a breath of the History Tripos; a good second two years ago I instinctively placed her. She might be expected to know her Ruskin by heart. The other was, perhaps, her younger sister; between child and woman, sweet and wholesome; alert; intelligent, breezy. As they came on she swept her frank eyes round the bewildering galaxy, and her countenance fell. Well it might, in view of so large an enterprise. Fancy beginning Turner! She turned with a gesture of appeal to her companion, and her lips opened:

"But, Aggie," she said, "these are all the same pictures as last year!"

Memoirs of the Moment.

LORD ROWTON was a fully and freely consenting party to the publication of the Disraeli correspondence in the Peel Papers. As the literary executor of Lord Beaconsfield his permission is necessarily obtained before any letter of Lord Beaconsfield's can be put into print for general circulation. Of course, Mr. C. S. Parker could have published surreptitiously the letter which has been everywhere quoted to show that Disraeli sought office from Peel, though he afterwards denied that he had done so; and he could have taken the risk of Lord Rowton's applying for an injunction against the further circulation of the volumes. But he did nothing of the kind. On the contrary—and the announcement is one which will be read with equal pleasure by the partisans of Peel and the partisans of Disraeli—the letter that is supposed to criminate the memory of Disraeli was specially submitted by the Hon. George Peel to Lord Rowton, who gave his special sanction for its publication. At present the only solution to this mystery of Disraeli's denial, made a few years later, is that he had meanwhile forgotten having written; but Lord Rowton is arranging to make a search among the Beaconsfield papers for anything that may throw a further light on the singular incident. Meanwhile, it is gratifying to know that, in Lord Rowton's opinion, there is nothing to suppress or to conceal—though there may be something to examine and explain—in the political memoirs of his late chief.

Nor equal in importance to the Peel Papers, but really no mean second to them, are the Hardwicke papers, just bought in their thousands by the British Museum. Secret as some of these letters were when they were penned by George II., George III., Pitt, Fox, Bute, and the rest, they are not more confidential than many in the Peel collection; and nearly the whole of them are earlier than those now published, and published almost without offence, by the representatives of the great Sir Robert. No work ever issued before these Peel Papers has shown Englishmen so clearly how they are governed; and as the Hardwicke Papers will supplement that fascinating disclosure, they ought undoubtedly to be read, selected, and edited. They are now all of a heap; and to make a mere list of them for the saleroom was the work of a month. But an editor of materials which are essentially the materials of our country's history ought not to be hard to find. The tastes of the present Lord Hardwicke are not those of the historian or the antiquary, which is perhaps lucky, as he has his own fortune to make, and is likely enough to be a success as a stockbroker.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT is the possessor of a temperament that cannot be idle, and that can hardly be aloof. Let no one suppose, therefore, that he feels in his element while he is sunning himself at Cannes. A letter to the Times on Ritualism is not by any means the full measure of his activity; and when he read the debate on Mr. Samuel Smith's amendment to the Address he longed to scent the battle once more, and to cry out with Achilles, "You shall know the difference now that I am back again."

The truth is, and his letters to private friends show it, that Sir William wearies of his life of leisure. It will not, therefore, be prolonged; and the House will soon be listening to rattling speeches from him in his strangely new capacity as a "private member."

ON Tuesday Mr. W. K. D'Arcy was married by special licence to Mrs. Nutting. Mr. D'Arcy is the Australian millionaire who gave commissions to the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones for the beautiful tapestries that are now among the great attractions of the New Gallery exhibition. They will be eagerly welcomed back to Stanmore Hall, Middlesex, whither Mr. and Mrs. D'Arcy have preceded them.

THE Corporation of Liverpool are much to be congratulated on the latest picture they have acquired for their Art Gallery. They have arranged to buy from Mr. Edward G. Hobley his charming picture, "The Shaft of Light," showing a long streak of sunshine penetrating the interior of a byre and lighting, in particular, with "refined vermilion" the ears of a white calf. It was hung in rather a corner in the last Royal Academy, and the only wonder is that it has waited till now to find a purchaser at the very moderate price at which it was marked.

A RECENT engagement of considerable public interest raises once more the familiar question of the appropriateness or otherwise of a marriage of inequality in years. The old-fashioned English novel, especially that written by a maiden lady, often presented the situation; and it was generally represented as a rather quaint and modest thing for feminine May to unite in marriage with masculine December. French and Italian literature, on the contrary, made such unions, and their end was invariably ironical. Then a slight change came over the English novelist's outlook, so that when George Eliot married a young woman to an elderly man, the elderly man at least had the grace to die in time for the young widow to wed a second husband, who was her contemporary. English fiction has yet, perhaps, to speak the truth. It is constantly afraid that derision will be meted out to relationships in novels which in actual life are perfectly familiar, which excite no smile, and which work out, against all theory, with absolute success. Harry Esmonde, for instance, remains almost the only man in English fiction who has married a woman older than himself. No other author has dared to put into fiction a situation which is familiar and dignified in fact, and of which Thackeray's own family has since afforded a delightful illustration.

LEO XIII. has a certain amount of literary fastidiousness; but he probably will not trouble to disown the little joke that has been put into his mouth, à propos of the installation of the electric light in the Vatican: "They cannot say that I love darkness any longer." An expressive shrug of the shoulder will probably be with him a sufficient disclaimer. St. Paul's in London and St. Peter's in Rome have always had connecting links; and the electric light is now to be installed in St. Paul's in such a way as to give full effect to the mosaics of Sir William Richmond. The cost—some £5,000—will be borne by an unexpected donor, Mr. Morgan, the banker of New York.

Drama.

"The Only Way."

IN respect of theme and period few romances offer so much that is enticing to the adaptor as Charles Dickens's novel, A Tale of Two Cities. But if its attractions are great, the difficulties confronting the would-be dramatist are no less numerous. Many have entered upon the task of transforming the book into an effective play, but, so far, none has achieved complete success. For the latest version, produced by Mr. Martin Harvey at the Lyceum, Mr. Freeman Wills is responsible. The result can only be regarded with a moderate measure of satisfaction. "The Only Way," as the piece is named, although containing some interesting and stimulating passages, is, as a whole, somewhat episodic, discursive, and retrospective in point of action. In the first two acts narration takes the place of movement; the vital quality of true development is absent from the characterisation. Mr. Wills, moreover, does not hesitate to leave in the elaboration of the story considerable gaps, which those acquainted with the original are, doubtless, quite capable of bridging over for themselves. It is obvious, however, that to presume upon the supposed knowledge of facts never presented to the notice of an audience is, on the part of an author, to claim a privilege to which he possesses no real title. In "The Only Way" there are scenes, notwithstanding, upon which the imagination fastens with a lively sense of pleasure. There is prettiness in the love-making episodes between Darnay and Lucie Manette in the quaint old garden in Soho; there are force and turbulence in the incident of St. Evrémonde's trial and condemnation by the Revolutionary Tribunal in Paris; there is infinite pathos in the final tableau, revealing Sydney Carton upon the scaffold in the act of laying down his life for the woman he loves. If these things do not exactly constitute a good play, they make, at any rate, an excellent entertainment, against which the sole reproach that can be brought is that it is a trifle too sad and sombre for ordinary tastes. The production, meanwhile, reflects every credit in so far as the mere question of mounting is concerned upon the theatre at which it is presented. Sir Henry Irving himself could hardly have given us a more beautiful series of stage pictures. In the cast, it is true, we look in vain for many of the characters who figure prominently in the novel; but in this regard it would, perhaps, be unfair to deny the adaptor a certain amount of latitude. Of Sydney Carton Mr. Martin Harvey furnishes an exquisitely pathetic and at times fairly powerful study, in which, however, stress is laid rather upon the imaginative and poetic than the reckless, devil-may-care aspect of the man's nature. Mr. Holbrook Blinn's portrait of Defarge is painted in colours somewhat too neutral, but it has, nevertheless, many good points; while Mr. Herbert Sleath as Darnay, Miss Grace Warner as Lucie, and Miss de Silva as Mimi, the little seamstress of the novel, although showing signs of inexperience, make abundantly manifest their desire to carry out the author's intentions.

London in Little.

I HAVE been looking at the "Mitre" in Fleet-street—Dr. Johnson's "Mitro." It is for sale next Monday, and the wise say it will be reconstructed. I grieve moderately. The place has been tampered with since Boswell and Johnson sat there, and Goldsmith essayed to shine there. Yet take the "Mitre" scenes out of Boswell, and what rents you would make in his book! I thought of Bozzy complaining to Dompster, after a night with Johnson at the "Mitro," that port wine and late hours affected his nerves, and Dompster replying: "One had better be palsied at eighteen than not keep company with such a man." Just so. I crossed Fleet-street, to Johnson's old house in Gough-square. And, lo, the Doctor was compensated. If his inn must go, his house in Gough-square has taken on a new comeliness. Sixty years back the occupier told Thomas Carlyle, who had made his way thither: "I have spent many a pound and penny on it." Pounds and pennies have again been forthcoming, and the door, and the many window-frames, and the area railings, are new-painted. Mrs. Johnson would have been charmed. "She was one of those ladies who are slaves to their own besoms," said Johnson (to the inquisitive Mrs. Thrale) long after her death. And then, as if to be just to her in a small point, he suffered the question—had he ever "huffed his wife about his dinner"? "So often," he replied, "that at last she called to me, and said: 'Nay, hold, Mr. Johnson, and do not make a farce of thanking God for a dinner which, in a few minutes, you will protest not eatable.'" And "Tetty" died in this house.

The little square—Gough-square—has its own litter, its own life. Printers' boys come and go, and chase each other. The steam presses croon softly within these Georgian houses that are now printing works. Two boys stopped, with a barrow, at the Doctor's door. I had a momentary conviction that they had come to fetch some sheets of the Dictionary to Mr. Millar in the Strand. But the tablet, "Dr. Samuel Johnson, Author, Lived Here," loosened the spell, and a man advancing to sell me cough lozenges broke it.

Correspondence.

"Rev. Lawrence Beeching."

SIR,—I find the above name heads a list of those suggested, in your last issue, as specially appropriate to "a parson troubled with religious doubt." As the suggestion is not your own, it would be useless for me to demand an explanation; but as you have given it publicity, you will perhaps allow me to make a protest.

The "Lawrence" does not concern me, and I can see a sort of reasonableness in it: the Saint was broiled, one side at a time, over a slow fire, and the implication is probably that the parson's torment is of the same tedious and two-sided character. But why "Beeching"? Has the name, I wonder, any dubious associations, either in fiction or in real life, of which I am unaware? In fiction I have met it only in a novel of Miss Alma Tadema's, and then as a place-name. For literature or science it would seem to have no import, sceptical or other, as I find it neither in Who's Who nor in Men of the Time. In the Clergy List I do find it, but only as referring to myself.

Under the circumstances, I think I am justified in suggesting to irresponsible and indolent novelists and their nomenclators that it would show good feeling if, when they want to borrow a name for some parson who is to cut a sorry figure, they should take one that is not in Crockford.

—I am, &c.,

H. C. BEECHING.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 20.

IN response to our request for a new National Anthem, a fine sheaf of patriotic sentiments has reached us. England surely never was so belauded before. The best poem contributed is that written by Mr. Isaac Sharp, 26, Clifton-terrace, Brighton, to whom a cheque for a guinea has been sent. It runs thus:

A NATIONAL HYMN.

O Thou in whom we live and move,
From whom all gracious powers proceed,
We own Thy guardian care and love
A stronghold in all time of need;
Lo, Thou hast willed to fence and gird
Our homeland by Thy saviour-sea.
The storm-wind which fulfils Thy word
Hath been our helpmate, charged by Thee!
At Thy deep impulse we have sprung
To bear Thy freedom o'er the earth,
O, keep us ever free and young
In simple truth and manly worth!
Of Thee we hold the imperial zone
Whereon Thy day doth ever shine,
Throughout it may Thy will be done,
Our power and kingdom linked with Thine!
O, guard us from each hostile blast,
Let no calm perfidy allure;
And teach us from the quarried past
To make the future's fabric sure.
O, bless us, crown the royal-crowned
With lustre of Thy heavenly grace,
And to our freedom's utmost bound
Bless every life of every race!

We print two chosen from the remainder of the National Anthems submitted:

A NEW NATIONAL ANTHEM.

Omnipotent! within Whose hand
The kingdoms of this world do lie,
In mercy, save our native land,
That so we live, that so we die,
In council, or in stricken fight,
Taught by Thy will to know the right.
Grant her who sits on Britain's throne,
Grant those who follow of her race,
To know that Thou and Thou alone,
King of all Kings, canst give the grace
To rule this people in Thy sight,
In peace, in justice, and in right.
What though our Empire send afar
Stout hearts that dare, strong hands that hold!
Without Thy help, we helpless are:
Our steel a reed, as dross our gold;
Stay Thou our weakness with Thy might,
And give us strength to guard our right.

Sons of the race that leads the world !

We owe our heritage to Thee ;

The flag that shame has never furl'd,

The lordship over all Thy sea.

Fain would we keep its honour bright,

Still strike for God, the Throne, the Right !

[C. L., London.]

A NATIONAL ANTHEM.

Thou who hast made us great,

Keep us inviolate,

Loyal and strong.

Make us to do Thy will ;

Give us Thy succour still ;

Keep us from doing ill ;

Save us from wrong.

From pride and lust of power

Keep us from hour to hour.

Let discord cease.

Still to earth's utmost shore

Thy wondrous blessings pour,

That we may know Thee more,

Thou God of Peace.

But if, at Thy command,

War leap from strand to strand,

Give us Thy grace ;

That on Thy battle-day

Our foes be swept away.

Save Thou our land we pray,

God save our race. [C. D., Birmingham.]

Competition No. 21.

THIS week we ask for suitable mottoes for daily or weekly papers of importance. Competitors are at liberty to choose what papers they like, but the motto must be appropriate to the paper's character, and its source must be indicated. To the competitor who sends the best set of three mottoes a prize of one guinea will be sent

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, February 28. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 252, or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

The "Academy" Bureau.

ON ACCOUNT OF SARAH.

By E. H. W.

In the matter of this novel, which we mentioned in last week's ACADEMY, a proposal for publication has been made.

COMRADES, AND OTHER POEMS.

By A. MYRON.

We have studied this MS., which comes from Port Elizabeth, South Africa, with much interest. Nearly all the pieces have that curious note of melancholy which distinguishes the poetry of Englishmen living far from home. When we find sadness or pessimism in verse written in England, we are not prepossessed in favour of the writer ; and usually our attitude is justified by the discovery that the bard's misery rings untrue. The case of the exiled Englishman is different. When he takes pen in hand, it is because he has something to say ; and often he says it with singular sincerity and grace. Good as the work is, it is not quite good enough to justify us in thinking that it could be published without loss. All the pieces have a certain haunting melody, and there are not a few charming passages in which the writer lingers over the scenery of nature ; but there is often a certain vagueness and indecision which Mr. Myron, we are sure, will himself deplore when he reads Tennyson or any other great master of the art.

THE SIN OF THE MOTHER.

By MARCUS KNOX.

We find it a task to read this work. A novel should arrest one's attention, and make the perusal easy by novelty of some kind ; but there is no novelty here. The work is not without touches of originality ; but these are few and far between. The plot lacks freshness, and the characters are conventional. Unfortunately, too, the style is in depressing harmony with the subject-matter. We find phrases such as "very interested" and "in comparison to" strewn through the work. What would "Marcus Knox" think of us if we said we were much sorry to find his book so troublesome ? Probably he would say that we did not know the language. Well, "very interested" and "very pleased" are as grammarless as "much sorry" and "much glad" ; and they are vulgar to boot. "In comparison to" is as atrocious as "in unison from" would be, if there were any novelist thoughtless enough to write it. We admit that many a good story has been written by persons with no academic knowledge of syntax or of style ; but when we come upon a work which has neither novelty of thought nor any indication that its author knows what style means, we necessarily regard it as hopeless.

TALES IN VERSE, AND OTHER POEMS.

By FREDERIC PRICE.

Mr. Price is a very candid observer of men and things. One evening he strolled into the library of a certain provincial college, and did not like the look of it :

Is this a place where Learning reigns supreme—

This solemn show ? For one, I'd rather study

Where Nature's freshness makes the heart grow ruddy,

And simple poets there may sit and dream

(Dew on the daisies) by a rippling stream.

Oh, what a den of books !

Mr. Price exclaims, and then goes on to upbraid the March of Intellect by contrasting it with the nightingale in the evening dell. His conclusion is that which is sound sense wittily expressed. Throughout the book we find ourselves in general sympathy with Mr. Price's view of life ; but it is only now and then that he writes even so well as in the stanza which we have quoted.

If glad's the fool, he's wise in being a fool ;

BETWEEN THE SIGNAL BOXES.

By G. F. LEATHERDALE.

These short stories have considerable merit ; but we do not think that they could be republished with success. The popular magazines have put an end to the vogue of the shilling book of tales for travellers by rail.

"La Belle Americaine," by R. H. ; "Willie and his Warriors," by Igna ; "His Sister, and Other Plays for Amateurs," by B. D. Cameron.—These works do not comply with the condition that each MS. submitted to the Bureau shall be sufficient to fill a reasonable volume.

MESSRS. C. ARTHUR PEARSON'S LIST.

SPINIFEX and SAND: a Narrative of Five Years' Pioneering and Exploration in Western Australia. By the Hon. DAVID W. CARNEGIE. With Illustrations by Ernest Synthe, and from Photographs, together with 4 Maps. Demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. "His record of its incidents and accidents has every quality that a narrative of this class should possess, and its well-sustained interest is enhanced by a large number of spirited drawings, photographs, and illustrated maps."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Carnegie's fascinating book is replete with valuable information, which cannot fail to be of use to the scientist, whether his special department of study be ethnological, botanical, geological, or geographical. In it there is no attempt at fine writing or glowing period; it is a simple and direct record of a splendid feat of endurance."—St. James's Gazette.

THE LAND of PIGMIES. By Captain Guy Burrows. Dedicated, by permission, to

His Majesty the King of the Belgians. With Introduction by H. M. STANLEY, M.P. Demy 8vo, cloth, with over 200 Illustrations, 21s.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to authors like Captain Burrows, who, while presenting us with extremely valuable information concerning the peculiarities of these races, can do so in such a lucid, easily grasped, and attractive manner. The chapter on cannibalism is of great interest, and excellently written. We recommend everyone who is interested in the ethnological problems of African races to read it."—Daily Chronicle.

"There is much useful information in Mr. Stanley's preface, and in Captain Burrows' narrative there is an amount of detail highly attractive to the thoughtful student of African matters. The book is fully illustrated."—Globe.

POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE ARCHDEACON. By L. B. Walford, Author of

"Mr. Smith," &c. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Mrs. Walford has done well a thing that is difficult of accomplishment in her recent novel, 'The Archdeacon'; she has taken up the wondrous tale of a love episode after an interval of twenty years..... 'The Archdeacon' is admirably drawn."—World.

MORD EM'LY. By W. Pett Ridge. Second Edition.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"All the characters in 'Mord Em'ly' are portrayed with fascinating skill..... We are thankful to Mr. Pett Ridge for the opportunity of making their acquaintance."—Bookman.

"In its way it is inimitable, and shows something approaching to genius."—Daily Graphic.

THE MEMBER'S WIFE. By the Hon. Mrs. Henry

CHETWYND, Author of "A Brilliant Woman," "A Dutch Cousin," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Mrs. Chetwynd always deals with social life in a pleasant and attractive form, and garnishes her stories with side-lights on society that are intensely amusing and realistic. 'The Member's Wife' is a very clever story."—Weekly Sun.

THE LOST PROVINCES. (Sequel to "An American Emperor.") By LOUIS TRACY, Author of "The Final War," &c. With 12 Illustrations by H. Piffard. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The story is admirably told, full of excitement, and is invested with an air of reality that impresses while it fascinates."—Lloyd's News.

THE OPTIMIST. By Herbert Morrah, Author of

"The Faithful City," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A well-told story, with a good plot and good characterisation."—Outlook.

"In 'The Optimist' Herbert Morrah gives us a novel peopled by truthfully conceived and dexterously drawn personages."—Dundee Advertiser.

SETTLED OUT of COURT. By G. B. Burgin,

Author of "Fortune's Footballs," &c. With Frontispiece by James

Greig. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"We have nothing but praise for Mr. Burgin's latest novel..... The sincerity, sympathy, and, above all, the naturalness of the story, are quite exceptional. Mr. Burgin writes tales of this description uncommonly well; he puts his whole heart into them, and the result is success of a very gratifying kind."—World.

NEW FICTION.

FRANCOIS the VALET. By G. W. Appleton. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

[Just published.]

"Full of humour, describes many interesting and by no means ordinary situations, and altogether forms an entertaining volume of reading."—London Morning.

DAVID HARUM. By Edward Noyes Westcott. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

[Just published.]

"Most of the scenes of this story are laid in Central New York, where the author passed nearly all his life. He has created in 'David Harum' a character so original, so true, and so strong, yet withal so delightfully quaint and humorous, that we are compelled at once to admit that here is a new and permanent addition to the long list of American literary portraits."—Extract from Preface by FORBES HEARMAN.

NEW STORY BY MRS. HERBERT MARTIN, Author of "Britomart," "Gentleman George," &c.

JOCK'S WARD. Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

SANATORIA for CONSUMPTIVES

In FRANCE, GERMANY, NORWAY, RUSSIA, SWIT-ZERLAND, UNITED STATES, and BRITISH POSSES-SIONS: Critical Descriptions, with Exposition of the Open-Air Treatment. By F. R. WALTERS, M.D. (London, M.R.C.P., Physician to the North London Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest. Introduction by Sir
 R. D. POWELL, Bart., M.D. 40 Plates. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Dr. Walters set himself a very difficult task, and he has accomplished it in a most praiseworthy manner. The main part of the book is devoted to a description of the Sanatoria in all parts of the world already existing or in course of construction. The author has evidently spared no pains in collecting the information, and a most valuable guide to such institutions is the result, probably the best that has hitherto been written.
 The work is consequently a valuable one to all physicians. In addition to the written description numerous illustrations and plans are given. The means of approach are also given, so that the medical adviser can give to his patient all the necessary knowledge before he leaves England. For this part of the book we have nothing but praise and can confidently recommend it to our readers."—Lancet.

The HISTORY of SOUTH AMERICA from its DISCOVERY to the PRESENT TIME. Compiled from the Works of the Best Authors and from authentic Documents (many hitherto unpublished) in various Archives and Public and Private Libraries in America and Spain.

 Translated from the Spanish by ADNAH D. JONES. With 2 Coloured Maps. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

THE FOUNDATIONS of ENGLAND

Twelve Centuries of British History (a.c. 65—A.D. 1154). By Sir JAMES H. RAMSAY, of Balliol, Bart., M.A. 2 vols.
 Maps and Illustrations, large 8vo, 24s.

"It is very likely indeed to become an indispensable textbook for the next generation of historical students. For the serious students of British history to-day, this work will serve to mark the extent of the new knowledge which has been won for them by the historical workers of the last thirty years.
 "The Foundations of England" is, in fact, a masterly précis of all the most valuable results which the careful analysis of original sources by the many historic workers of the last thirty years has revealed, and that not in the form of a mere collatione rerum, but of a narrative at once continuous, uniform, and consistent."—Literature.

A SHORT HISTORY of SWITZER- LAND.

By Prof. DÄNDLIKER. Translated by E.
 SALISBURY. With 2 Coloured Maps. 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"Can hardly fail to meet with a cordial welcome from those whose interest in the favourite touring ground of the Briton is not limited to a sight of its imposing mountains and beautiful lakes. It has everything to recommend it; it is written by a competent and discriminating historian; it is complete without being either minute or diffuse; the translation is excellent."
 —Glasgow Herald. "Mr. Salisbury has done a real service by turning the small Dändliker into English. For those who have a genuine taste for history his work is a treat. His historical instinct is equal to his erudition, and his impartiality is beyond reproach."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Literary Week.

MR. KIPLING'S grave illness has been the event of the week. Nothing else was talked of. "How is Kipling?" was the first question asked at breakfast tables throughout the country; and messages of sympathy from the ends of the earth have poured into the New York hotel where he lies. To find a parallel case it would be necessary to go back to the death of Charles Dickens. This is a very remarkable fact when we remember that Mr. Kipling is a writer of but thirty-three years of age, whose work has ever avoided the sentimental and humanely genial, such as usually endears an author to his readers, but has been notable rather for uncompromising vigour. It seems to indicate that the English people know a strong man when they see one, and are conscious of the tremendous moral force in the hands of this far-sighted student of tendencies.

MR. RUDYARD KIPLING.

From the Portrait by the Hon. John Collier.

It is probable that much of the feeling resultant upon the rumours of Mr. Kipling's serious plight—and for a day or two death seemed inevitable—would have been absent had this lamentable illness come two years earlier. Mr. Kipling had not then the place he now holds in English hearts and intellects. His was already the most considerable voice of the younger generation; but his impassioned note of patriotism, although he had often struck it resonantly, had not vibrated throughout English-speaking lands as it has since done. The beginning of Mr. Kipling's leadership—for he is an Anglo-Saxon leader, say what we may—was the "Recessional." People then for the first time recognised that an eloquent advocate of Imperialism and national rectitude was continually on the watch. From that time there have been in the public mind two Kiplings—Kipling the great story-teller and Kipling a national stimulus and guide. Hence the extraordinary manifestation of feeling which we have just witnessed.

We may take it, however, from the latest bulletins, that all is well, and Mr. Kipling is on the road to recovery. In this difficult and tedious process he will have the good wishes of thousands of his countrymen and Americans; for since "The White Man's Burden" America claims him too.

Help me to need no aid from men,
That I may help such men as need—was once his noble prayer. How did it run?—

The depth and dream of my desire,
The bitter paths wherein I stray,
Thou knowest Who hast made the Fire,
Thou knowest Who hast made the Clay.

One stone the more swings to her place
In that dread Temple of Thy Worth—
It is enough that through Thy grace
I saw nought common on Thy earth.

Take not that vision from my ken;
Oh whatsoever may spoil or speed,
Help me to need no aid from men,
That I may help such men as need.

The time for the aid of men has indeed come; and never, it is good to think, can a fellow-being have received more solicitous care.

An evening paper, under the title of the Evening Telegraph, will probably soon make its appearance. For some time the project has been under consideration of the Daily Telegraph authorities. The editor, in all likelihood, will be Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P. As a matter of fact, for several years an Evening Telegraph has been issued every day from Peterborough Court, not, however, for the public, but to protect the title.

THE new instalment of Stevenson's letters in Scribner belong to his sojourn at Mentone, in search of health, in 1873-4. They are serious and young, but full of hints of the writer's future. Here is a passage concerning the literary work which Stevenson was then contemplating:

You have not yet heard of my book — Four Great Scotsmen — "John Knox, David Hume, Robert Burns, Walter Scott"? These, their lives, their work, the social media in which they lived and worked, with, if I can so make it, the strong current of the race making itself felt underneath and throughout — this is my idea. You must tell me what you think of it. The Knox will really be new matter, as his life hitherto has been disgracefully written, and the events are romantic and rapid; the character very strong, salient, and worthy; much interest as to the future of Scotland, and as to that part of him which was truly modern under his Hebrew disguise. Hume, of course, the urbane, cheerful, gentlemanly, letter-writing eighteenth century, full of attraction, and much that I don't yet know as to his work. Burns, the sentimental side that there is in most Scotsmen, his poor troubled existence, how far his poems were his personally, and how far national, the question of the framework of society in Scotland, and its fatal effect upon the finest natures. Scott again, the ever delightful man, sane, courageous, admirable; the birth of Romance, in a dawn that was a sunset; snobbery, conservatism, the wrong thread in history, and notably in that of his own land.

Stevenson did not accomplish the task, but his Familiar Studies of Men and Books contain some fruit of these Mentone speculations.

THE humorous Stevenson is seldom evident. Solitariness in a foreign land, the mortifying presence of poor health, and the absence of congenial companions for fun, may each have been a cause. Stevenson himself perceived it. In a letter to Mr. Charles Baxter, he said:

I have not made a joke, upon my living soul, since I left London. O! except one, a very small one, that I had made before, and that I very timidly repeated in a half-exhilarated state towards the close of dinner, like one of those dead-a-live flies that we see pretending to be quite light and full of the frivolity of youth in the first sunshiny days. It was about mothers' meetings, and it was damned small, and it was my ewe lamb — the Lord knows I couldn't have made another to save my life — and a clergyman quarrelled with me, and there was as nearly an explosion as could be.

The confession has in it a touch of Elia.

LADY MURRAY'S Home of Rest for Authors is now open. This establishment, which is situated at Antibes, a few miles from Cannes, bears the name of the Château de l'Espérance. The house stands in its own grounds. A director is in charge, and already two Frenchmen and a Russian poet are under his care, while one or two Englishmen are expected. Lady Murray has endowed the Home so handsomely that a pound per week is all that is asked of those that use it. The Home will remain open until May 1, and then close until November 1, as it is intended only for winter residence. All communications concerning it should be made to Lady Murray, Villa Victoria, Cannes, to whom the warm thanks of the literary profession are due for her kindly solicitude and generosity.

MR. HAGGARD's new novel, Swallow, in which he returns to Africa and leaves vaccination to others, is dedicated to Lieut.-Col. Sir Marshal Clarke, in a letter wherein the author suggests that with whatever feeling he might view the conquest and subjugation of the Boers his sympathies would still be largely theirs. The story is, however, not of the present Boers, but their ancestors, the Voortrekkers of 1836.

THERE are two ways of looking at books with rough edges, brown paper covers, wide margins and all other accessories of precious publishing. It is possible to like them and it is possible to disapprove. An American publishing firm recently issued a biography with certain of the tokens of high art evident in its format. The books were sent out for distribution by agents in the usual way; but one of the agents protested. He wrote: "I received those books this morning, and I cannot do anything with them as they are not books that any man would want to buy for his library. . . . There is not a leaf in them that is trimmed; the edges all stick out past the binding and are all just torn off so that they look like a lot of fringe made out of paper, and I will never deliver them to the gentlemen I sold them to, for if I was buying books I just would not receive them at all at any price." He has many of our sympathies.

IN the March Cornhill the correspondence of Miss Elizabeth Etchingham and her brother Sir Richard comes to an end. The authors' names are now printed: Mrs. Fuller Maitland and Sir Frederick Pollock; and the letters will probably be issued shortly in book form. Meanwhile we might remark that not the least interesting and amusing of the extracts in Sir M. E. Grant-Duff's new selections from his diary (reviewed on another page) are passages from Sir Frederick Pollock's private letters.

IN the same number of Cornhill Mr. MacDonagh writes of by-ways of journalism, with special reference to the "liner," or outside reporter, who contributes to newspapers short accounts of remarkable events. The following account is printed as an indication of the superficial atrocity of the liner's blameless trade:

THE "MORNING MERCURY."

To S. W. W. Clacton, Dr.	s.	d.
For Atrocious Murder in Bigley-street, S.E.	4	2
Burning of Brewster's factory, Mile-end	2	3
Sinking of a Thames passenger steamer	3	2
Dreadful Shipping Conflagration at the Docks	6	1
Poisoning of the Macklin family, Drury-lane	2	6

At the first blush one is reminded of the robber's daughter in the Bab Ballad.

MR. MACDONAGH gives some specimens of the liner's unconscious humour. A man named Ducan had been murdered. The liner wrote: "The murderer was evidently in quest of money, but, luckily, Mr. Ducan had deposited all his funds in the bank the day before, so that he lost nothing but his life." Some one had been knocked down and removed to the hospital. The liner wrote: "He is progressing favourably, although he is sedulously attended by Dr. Blank, the resident surgeon, and some of the leading members of the medical staff." The pity of it is that the liner's unconscious humour is so often corrected by the sub-editor before it reaches the public. Sub-editors as a body must prevent a vast deal of innocent fun and playful libel. There was a time when the liner was always a man; but competitive woman is now on the scene, and in many cases to-day "the liner she's a lady."

THE introduction to Philip, the new volume in the Biographical Thackeray, has much in it concerning Cornhill's beginnings. Mrs. Ritchie tells the story of her father's connexion with the magazine, his search for a title, and so forth. She also gives one or two of the "thorns in the cushion," but they are not more pointed than those which other editors endure. It was perfectly right for Thackeray to cease to edit Cornhill, for he had other and more distinguished work to do; but his reasons were somewhat trivial. We reproduce one of his drawings, representing himself as editor holding Time by the forelock.

For many years the novels of Dumas, Sue, and Hugo have had, in translation, vogue in Turkey, but German novelists have been unknown there. Recently, however, a young Turkish literary man thought to break this convention and let his countrymen read a romance produced by the nation which sends so many officers to the Turkish army. He therefore translated Wilhelm Tell, and forthwith wished that he had done nothing of the sort. The first intimation of the publication of the book was not, as in England, a letter from a press-cutting agency offering to supply notices, but a visit from the police, followed by imprisonment. The translator, or red revolutionary as the authorities were pleased to consider him, lay there for some months, and was then banished and deprived of his military rank. He is now in Switzerland.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us, under the title of "The Good Conceit," his declaration of independence. For the sake of emphasis he has borrowed a mould from Mr. Henley into which to run his molten brass. This is his battle-cry:

Out of the cloud that covers me
And blots the stars and seldom lifts,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my indubitable gifts.
Under the whip—upon the setts,
Men drive me many a galling mile,
My stock of Editors' regrets
Would fill a barrow, but—I smile.
Fast by this trade of wind and wit
I mean to hold till life be done,
And every year I stay in it
Finds, and shall find me, tugging on.
It matters not how stiff and sheer
The climb—how difficult the sum,
I am the man they've got to hear!
I am the man that's bound to come!

It is wonderful what a publisher can do to give a book circulation by presenting it to the public with skill and prestige. We learn that Mr. Dent has been able to sell to the British public ten thousand copies of Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici in his "Temple Classics" series. One would, of course, like to know how many of these copies are read, and how many are bought as furniture. But that the effect of so large a circulation is to multiply readers of a standard work there can, we think, be no doubt.

THERE appears to be some confusion about Dr. Johnson's residence in Johnson's-court, Fleet-street. No. 7, Johnson's-court is about to be demolished, and is photographed in the Sketch as Dr. Johnson's residence. Mr. Wheatley, on the other hand, states that Johnson's house in Johnson's-court was pulled down when Anderton's Hotel was built. In that case it must have been situated in the passage nearer Fleet-street than Johnson's-court proper. The court, by the way, is not named after the Doctor, but bore its present name before he lived in it. In allusion to this fact he called himself, when on tour in the Hebrides, "Johnson of that ilk."

THE publication of Mr. Lane's edition of White's Selborne, in monthly parts, has just begun, and the book promises to be a charming one. Mr. New's drawings have all his accustomed quiet beauty and sharp contrasts of black and white, and Mr. Grant Allen's annotations are practical and learned.

THE proprietors of the Sunday Special have acquired To-Day and Madame. Mr. Barry Pain has, however, resigned his post as To-Day's editor.

A NEW magazine, on precisely opposite lines to the democratic monthlies which are now the fashion, is in preparation. The editor will be Lady Randolph Churchill, the contributors will be drawn exclusively from the aristocracy, and the price of each copy will be a guinea.

MR. CLARENCE ROOK'S forthcoming "document," Hooligan Nights, a foretaste of which was given in a series of articles in the Chronicle, is in no way imaginative. Mr. Rook's hero, Young Alf, has a real existence, and such things as are narrated of him are true. Mr. Rook, indeed, so far pursued intimacy with this engaging reprobate that he officiated as best man at his wedding. The book should be popular, for it is not only veracious but humorous.

Bibliographical.

Cometh Up as a Flower, with which Messrs. Macmillan start their new two-shilling series, made its first appearance, in two volumes, in March, 1867. Who that read it then could have believed that it would last till to-day? It reached a second and a third edition in the first year of its existence, and was reprinted twice in 1868. It was also reprinted in 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1876, and 1878. After that, it was reprinted only in 1883, 1889, and 1895. Its vogue, therefore, may be said to have extended over eleven years—from 1867 to 1878. Its original success is easily accounted for by the unconventionality of its tone and style. How it did startle the literary and domestic dovescotes! It "killed the girls and thrilled the boys," and the authoress found herself famous throughout the land. Not Wisely, But Too Well, had much the same species of success. With Red as a Rose is She, Good-bye, Sweetheart, and Nancy came a notable improvement; and in Belinda, which belongs to 1883, Miss Broughton reached (me judice) the high-water mark of her achievement.

Miss Mary Dickens's new novel, they say, is to follow the example of several recent predecessors in dealing (wholly, or incidentally—I know not which) with theatrical life. Now, it is in Miss Dickens's favour that she is quite competent to do this; she will know what she is talking about. She has had practical experience of the stage. I remember very well seeing her at the Princess's Theatre during Mr. Wilson Barrett's occupancy of that house. She was in the original casts of "Claudian," "Chatterton" (Mr. H. A. Jones's), "Junius," and "The Colour-Sergeant." She was also the Player Queen in the revival of "Hamlet." Twelve or thirteen years ago she enacted Madeline in a performance of "The King of the Commons" given by those worthy young people, the Dramatic Students. Since then, I fancy, she has done nothing on the boards. Knowing her to be the grand-daughter of Dickens, I naturally took great interest in her efforts, which seemed to me to be marked by abundant intelligence.

The Religion of Shakespeare—to think that anybody, at this time of day, should devote a whole volume to the consideration of this subject! Does Father Bowden propose (as others have attempted before now) to argue that Shakespeare was a Papist? But it is the antiquity of the topic that strikes one. It is just a little over half a century since W. J. Birch published his Inquiry into the Philosophy and Religion of Shakespeare, and since then how many have worried themselves in the same way! But there is vitality in everything connected with the Bard. As if there were not multitudinous editions of the Works by present-day people, a bold bookseller announces a reproduction of that which Samuel Weller Singer, F.S.A., gave to the world just seventy-three years ago.

Book-titles do not always explain themselves fully. Thus, Mr. Brimley Johnson is credited with the intention of bringing out a work to be called The History of England in Verse. Does this mean that he is himself going to turn poetical chronicler, or that he will compile a History of England out of episodes from the writings of English rhymers? For the latter enterprise there is, of course, plenty of material. Nay, did not the late W. C. Bennett make, thirty years ago, Proposals for a Ballad History of England? And did not the late Francis Turner Palgrave put into very tolerable verse certain Visions of England? From Drayton's "Ballad of Agincourt" to Tennyson's "Revenge" English poetry, happily, is full of the celebration of national incident and character.

Mr. G. S. Layard, who has undertaken to write the biography of Mrs. Lynn Linton, is already favourably known as the author of the Life of Charles Keene, and of books on Cruikshank's Portraits of Himself and Tennyson's Pre-Raphaelite Illustrators.

It is positively humiliating to be told that Miss Rosa Nouchette Carey's novels and stories have circulated to the number of a quarter of a million, and to realise that not one of those 250,000 volumes has ever been perused by me. What may I not have lost? It would seem that Miss Carey first loomed on the literary horizon with the tale called Nellie's Memories; and that was just thirty years ago. Then came her Wee Wife, and, by and bye, her Wood and Married. And really, when I come to note the names of some of Miss Carey's fictions, I am not in the least surprised at their popularity. Little Miss Muffet, Lover or Friend, Not Like Other Girls, The Old, Old Story, Only the Governess, Mollie's Prince—who could resist such titles? I am quite sure I couldn't—if I were "sweet seventeen."

If the edition of the works of Robert Greene promised by the Clarendon Press be moderate in price, it will be welcomed; but, in any case, it is good news that the Press will issue before long an edition of Dryden's critical essays. A selection from these essays was edited by Prof. Yonge in 1882; in 1886 Prof. Henry Morley reprinted the discourses on Satire and Epic Poetry; and editions of the essay on Dramatic Poesy appeared in 1877 and 1889. All these have been acceptable to the student of English literature; but something more comprehensive is desirable, and it is to be hoped that the volume promised by the Clarendon Press will meet the case.

At the first blush one was inclined to say that the advertised volume of verse by the Very Rev. Dr. Stubbs, the Dean of Ely, was the Dean's first adventure in the field of rhyme and rhythm. As a matter of fact, however, this most notable of "Christian Democrats" has wooed the Muse before, as witness his book, The Conscience, and Other Poems, published so long ago as 1884.

Reviews.

Sir Robert Peel.

Sir Robert Peel. Vols. II. and III. Edited by C. S. Parker. (Murray. 32s.)

IN these volumes Mr. Parker brings to an end his careful and conscientious history of the life and letters of the great statesman whose name they bear. Where so much labour and such anxious care have been so freely expended, it seems almost ungracious to criticise; and yet the truth must be spoken that the book would have been of nearly as much value to the genuine student of history, and of much greater to the ordinary reader, had it been of half the size. It is a work out of which some future historian will quarry a really great life of Peel; but a man must be an enthusiast on Corn Laws and Catholic Emancipation to read without skipping the twelve hundred ample pages which are here set before him.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON AND SIR ROBERT PEEL.
From the Picture by Winterhalter.

Not that we would undervalue Mr. Parker's work, but that we wish he had had a little more compassion for poor human nature and had not thought fit to hide the real gems of Peel's correspondence among piles of surely the most commonplace letters which that commonplace age produced. He spares us nothing. Take, for instance, the following letter to Lord Stanley, which we have selected at haphazard and could match with hundreds more of the same kind; "I am glad that you approved the general tenor of my letter to the Duke. Enclosed is his reply to it, written in very good temper. He certainly will not send the letter which he addressed to you." With all submission, a report of the conversations between Lady Blarney and Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs were more entertaining and almost equally instructive. Yet it is but justice to say that the reader who has the patience to wade through this literary sudd will find an ample reward, and will obtain a grasp on the history of his country during the lifetime of Peel which will be an abiding possession. Is there a better example of tact and perception of how men will look at the most indifferent actions in times of excitement than the following passage from his letter to Mr. Charles Arbuthnot on the death of Canning? "I am very sorry that I am in town. We have just resolved on taking Shelley's place, Maresfield, and shall go there as soon as we possibly can. The Duke, very properly in my opinion, left town yesterday for Strathfieldsaye. I think you determine wisely in not coming to town at the present moment." Evidently he was resolved not to be identified with those whom the Times described as vultures hovering round Canning's remains, and did not intend to allow his friends to be so.

"I," said the Duke of Wellington on a famous occasion, "have no small talk and Peel has no manners," but in what firm, yet dignified, terms Peel could address his sovereign may be gathered from the letter which he wrote to the King when the latter, in the face of all advice, persisted in reprieving Comyn, who was under sentence of death, and who seems to have been as pretty a rascal as County Clare could produce:

I feel it to be my painful duty humbly and respectfully to submit to your Majesty that, had your Majesty been pleased to consult me on this occasion, one which I consider of deep interest to the administration of the law in Ireland, I could not have advised your Majesty to command the remission of the capital sentence.

It only remains to be added that as the result of this remonstrance Comyn was incontinently hanged, and that the King, in a despairing attempt to calm the Royal spirits, took, teste the Duke of Wellington, 250 drops of laudanum in thirty-six hours.

We have already referred to those strange letters from Disraeli and his wife which are now published for the first time, and which appear to throw such an unpleasant light upon the veracity of that great man. Let us say at once that it is not possible to get round them in any way. In the September of 1841 Disraeli writes to Peel a letter which will bear no other construction than that of a humble, an almost despairing, appeal for recognition in the Government which was then being formed. The letter ends: "I confess to be unrecognised at this moment by you appears to me to be overwhelming, and I appeal to your own heart—to that justice and that magnanimity which I feel are your characteristics—to save me from an intolerable humiliation." On the same day Mrs. Disraeli—almost certainly on her husband's instigation—writes another letter to the Minister in imploring terms. Yet, on May 15, 1846, Disraeli has the apparently unparalleled effrontery to say from his place in Parliament in face of the man to whom these letters were sent: "I can say that I never asked a favour of the Government, not even one of those mechanical things which persons are obliged to ask. With respect to my being a solicitor for office, it is entirely unfounded." Now, what is the explanation of that astounding statement? If Disraeli remembered the existence of those letters, he must have known that Peel, a careful man, who was not likely to have destroyed correspondence of such importance, had nothing to do but to turn them up and annihilate with their evidence his dangerous, persistent, and malignant foe. No plea that they were confidential could have availed to prevent Peel from reading them to the House, for his own veracity was in question and he was entitled to defend it by their means. Now, whatever may be thought of Disraeli, his worst enemy would hardly have called him a fool, and deliberately to place this weapon in Peel's hands implies a degree of folly inconceivable in any sane man. We are convinced that, incredible as it may appear, Disraeli was seized with one of those strange lapses of memory which, at one time or another, come upon every man in debate, and forgot that these letters had ever been written. We grant that it is difficult, almost impossible, to believe, and yet, since it is the least incredible of all possible explanations, we are bound to accept it. Nothing, by the way, redounds more highly to the honour of Peel than that, with this damning evidence in his possession, he refused to use it, and left the House to judge between his simple word and his accuser's.

In his correspondence with Arbuthnot there is a delightful freedom, which we do not expect to find in his letters to more important men. The following was written in 1846, and we devoutly hope, for Lady Lyndhurst's sake, that the heading, "Secret," had all due attention:

I cannot, of course, be answerable for the follies of Lady Lyndhurst. I have had no communication direct or indirect with Lyndhurst, or any of his family, on the position of the Government.

Many people assert that which is untrue solely for the purpose of getting a short-lived notoriety. If the pretence of knowing Cabinet secrets made Lady Lyndhurst a lioness at breakfast for three hours, that probably was sufficient fame for her. The exposure of her ignorance would probably not take place till after breakfast was over.

We cannot deny ourselves the luxury of one more quotation from Sir Robert's correspondence, because it reveals him in a light which is quite unexpected. It is to Tom Hood, and runs as follows:

You perhaps think that you are known to one with such multifarious occupations as myself merely by general reputation. But I assure you that there can be little which you have written which I have not read, and that there are few who admire more than myself the good sense and good feeling which have taught you to infuse so much fun and merriment into writings correcting folly and exposing absurdities, and yet never trespassing beyond those limits within which wit and facetiousness are not very often confined.

Now who would ever have pictured him chuckling over Miss Kilmansegg?

The Great Dean.

Unpublished Letters of Dean Swift. Edited by George Birkbeck Hill, D.C.L., LL.D. (Fisher Unwin. 12s.)

THESE letters were written by Swift to an Anglo-Irish squire, one Knightley Chetwode, of Woodbrook, near Portarlington. They do not appear ever to have been utilised as biographical material. Forster had them before him, but his death left the Life of Swift uncompleted before it had reached the period which they illustrate. Sir Henry Craik does not appear to know of them, or of Knightley Chetwode himself. Fortunately they have fallen into the competent hands of Dr. Birkbeck Hill, who now edits them with the ample comment which his "extensive and peculiar" knowledge of the eighteenth century suggests. Indeed, sometimes the comment becomes more than the text, and an unimportant letter serves merely as a peg upon which Dr. Birkbeck Hill hangs story after story, and saying after saying, of the great Dean and his friends. For the letters themselves, stripped of their editorial trappings, are not, perhaps, quite the very best Swift. The series begins in 1714, when Swift had just become Dean of St. Patrick's, and when the death of Queen Anne and the accession of George the First had dashed the hopes of the Jacobite plotter, and sent him back to Ireland "a soured and querulous man." He was for a time in daily fear of disgrace and prosecution, and for the seven long years of his eclipse the burden of his correspondence is a venting of his spleen against the human race, and a complaint of his personal embarrassments, of failing health, troublesome servants, and a shrunken purse. It is not pretty reading, and the sparks of humour, or still rarer humanity, that lighten and sweeten it, are few and far between. "As to your information of passages in private life," he cries, "it is a thing I never did nor shall pursue. . . . I love the World as little, and think as ill of it as most People, and I would as lieve peep three Hours a Morning into a Jakes." And again, with equal feeling but with more decency, "I have often thought that a Gentleman in the Country is not a bit less happy for not having Power in it, and that an Influence at Sizes and Sessions, and the like, is altogether below a wise man's Regard, especially in such a dirty, obscure nook of the World as this Kingdom." Swift's "Advice to Servants" is one of his most characteristic pieces of grim and somewhat nasty humour; and the letters give a vision of him in the process of getting his experience. He is held by contrary winds, and "used worse than a Dog at Holyhead," and his valet suffers for it: "Pray pity poor Wat, for he is called dunce, puppy, and liar 500 times per hour, and yet he means not ill, for he means nothing."

Another time he writes to Chetwode: "Did he tell you how I pulled Tom Locks the wrong way for holding a Plate under his Armpitt and what cursed Bacon we had with our Beans?" Here Dr. Birbeck Hill strikes in with a note, which seems to us a delightful parody of the ways of the serious commentators. "Dr. Johnson," he says, "was more patient with his black servant, Frank, than the Dean was with his Irish Tom. Miss Reynolds tells us how 'one day, as his man was waiting at Sir Joshua's table, the Doctor observed with some emotion that he had the salver under his arm.' The emotion did not express itself in hostile acts." Irish workmen proved as unsatisfactory as Irish servants. Swift built a wall round a plot of ground, which he called "Naboth's Vineyard," because, he said, he "had cheated one of his neighbours out of it." He dealt with the men employed in an ingenious fashion, which must have caused him some gratification:

When the masons were building it (as most tradesmen are rogues), I watched them very close, and as often as they could they put in a rotten stone, of which, however, I took no notice until they had built three or four perches beyond it. Now, as I am an absolute monarch in the liberties and King of the rabble, my way with them was to have the wall thrown down to the place where I observed the rotten stone; and by doing so five or six times the workmen were at last convinced it was their interest to be honest.

Fortune smiled upon Swift once more. His Drapier Letters, though it is doubtful whether they profited anyone very much, at least raised him to an height of unexampled prosperity. Medals were cast, handkerchiefs printed, and ale-house signs swung in his honour. But, frankly, the great man knew how to comport himself as little in prosperity as in adversity. The correspondence ends with a quarrel picked between the two old friends. The precise ground of it does not seem recoverable. Dr. Birbeck Hill thinks that "it seems likely that the chief blame of the rupture did not lie at Swift's door." To give Swift advice was, indeed, in the style of his friend Delany, "to venture to speak to him"; but Chetwode was also a suspicious and a punctilious man. This may very well be so, but surely no provocation can readily excuse the deliberate insolence of stinging phrase in Swift's last letter. The careful Chetwode endorses it—and you can hardly wonder—"A very extraordinary letter designed, I suppose, to mortify me":

Sr,—Your letter hath lyen by me without acknowledging it, much longer than I intended, or rather this is my third time of writing to you, but the two former I burned in an hour after I had finished them, because they contained some passages which I apprehended some of your pique might possibly dislike, for I have heard you approve of one principle in your nature, that no man had ever offended you, against whom you did not find some opportunity to make him regret it, although perhaps no offence were ever designed. This perhaps, and the other art you are pleased with, of knowing the secrets of families, which as you have told me was so wonderful that some people thought you dealt with old Nick, hath made many families cautious of you. And to say the truth, your whole scheme of thinking, conversing, and living, differ in every point from mine. . . . That you returned from an amour without profit, I do not wonder, nor that it was more pleasurable, if the Lady as I am told be sixty, unless her literal and metaphorical talents were very great; yet I think it impossible for a woman of her age, who is both wise and rich, to think of matrimony in earnest. However I easily believe what you say that women have not yet lost all their charms with you—who could find them in a Sybel. I am sorry for what you say that your ambition is unsatiated, because I think there are few men alive so little circumstanced to gratify it. . . . I cannot imagine what any people can propose by attempts against you, who are a private country Gentleman, who can never expect any Employment or power. I am wondering how you came acquainted with Horace or St. Ambrose, since neither Latin nor Divinity have been your Studies; it seems a miracle to me.

Swift did not burn all his early drafts of this letter; or if he did, he amused himself by drawing up yet another as literature. For a version, even more neatly and cruelly put, appears among his published correspondence, with the superscription "To Ventoso." It is an ugly episode, look at it how you will. No doubt every word of the criticism on Chetwode was deserved. But it was written in the height of Swift's fame, to a man whose house had been open to him in his adversity. Of all the men of commanding genius, surely this is the one who, time after time, leaves the worst taste in the mouth.

Good Anecdote.

Notes from a Diary Kept Chiefly in Southern India. By Sir Mountstuart E. Grant-Duff. 2 vols. (Murray. 18s.)

SIR MOUNTSTUART GRANT-DUFF has already permitted the public to read four volumes of selections from his private diary for the years between 1851 and 1881. He now adds five other years, bringing his record down to 1886: and in a preface more are promised. The period covered in the new instalment was that of Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff's residence in India as Governor of Madras; hence, except to Anglo-Indians, many of these pages are less interesting than those that preceded them. But there is so much left, after the Indian portions have been abstracted, that the ordinary reader's enjoyment will still be considerable. As before, the best things are stories narrated by other persons and copied by the diarist. Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff is revealed as a kindly personality, a man of genial tolerance and wide reading, intensely interested in living, in men, in books, and in nature. But he is not a remarkable writer, nor are his thoughts more striking than those of the average English intellectual man of affairs. Yet he has met so many fascinating and notable people, and has preserved so skilfully their salient utterances, that his pages produce very much the same effect as a brilliant and original work.

We content ourselves with extracting from Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff's entertaining volumes a few of the passages which have a peculiarly literary flavour. Thus: "April 14, 1882.—The European mail arrives. — writes, that when Lord Houghton's death at Athens was rumoured, Sir F. Doyle said his exit is the result of too many entrées. May 12.—Lubbock [in a letter] mentions that a boy, sent from Rugby to a school where more attention was paid to science, was asked: 'What is a theodolite?' 'A hater of God,' was the reply." Another examinee's quaint answer, quoted later, may be inserted here. The question was: "What speeches produced the most remarkable results in ancient and modern times?" and the reply: "In ancient times, 'Let there be light'; in modern times, 'Up, Guards, and at them!'" To resume: "Jan. 12, 1883.—Mat Arnold, writing on the 14th November . . . says: 'In next month's Macmillan there will be a little poem of mine, which I think and hope you and your wife, and perhaps Clara too, will like. John Morley, who has not seen it, persists in speaking of it as a Dirge on a Parrot. I will only say it is not that.'" The poem was "Poor Matthias," a dirge on a canary. On May 24 we find this definition of a deputation by Gladstone: "A noun of numbers signifying many, but not signifying much." "March 13, 1884.—A lady, talking to me to-night, quoted her old Irish Catholic nurse, defending her Church from some aspersions, as having used the phrase, quite new to me, 'Paper never refuses ink; don't believe all you read.' August 7.—A. Russell writes: 'We breakfasted with Gladstone this morning. Millais, who was there, classed the five following heads under the same type—Seneca, Savonarola, Dante, Cardinal Newman, George Eliot.' Nov. 24.—While dictating a letter to-day, I remembered that J. R. Green, the historian, had one day asked me which of all the inventions of our day had done most for the working classes? I guessed this and that; but his answer was: 'Beyond all doubt, sixpenny photographs.' May 19, 1885.—A lady mentioned . . . that Swinburne had asked her what were the two finest lines in the language? He answered his own question by quoting from Sordello:

As the king-bird with ages on his plumes
Travels to die in his ancestral glooms.

June 14.—. . . the saying attributed to Sir Frankland Lewis about his son, whose excellent, but very serious, books did not suit his taste: 'I wish to God that George couldn't write, or that I couldn't read.' September 3, 1885.—There came into my mind the excellent story which M. Arnold told me years ago of his visit to Villemain. He found the old gentleman's oak . . . sported, and, meeting him some days afterwards in society, mentioned the fact. 'Pourquoi n'avez vous pas insisté?' was the reply, 'vous m'auriez trouvé renfermé lisant votre Méropé!' November 20.—. . . The late Dean of Wells . . . having to propose the health of Mr. Freeman, the historian, whom he did not love, spoke of 'our distinguished guest who has reproduced with such marvellous fidelity the barbarous manners of our ancestors.' July 8, 1886.—A correspondent tells me that Kinglake was recently startled by a lunatic, who came to say that his late wife had appeared to him in a dream, and directed him to find and convert William Alexander Kinglake to Catholicism at once. Kinglake replied that even in heaven he would expect accuracy, and that his name was Alexander William Kinglake. This, and a steady gaze, so froze his visitor that he withdrew."

Finally, let us quote this (belonging to 1879), which is a surprise indeed: "The Breakfast Club met at Henry Cowper's. [Sir Frederick] Pollock told us that it was he, and not Sydney Smith, who said to the child who was patting the tortoise, 'You might as well stroke the dome of St. Paul's by way of pleasing the Dean and Chapter.' Pollock first put about the story under the name of his father, the Lord Chief Baron, but it was really his own. The child was his brother George." So many of Sydney Smith's sayings have been traced to other origins that we shall begin to believe he was no wit at all. The great Sydney Myth should be examined by a competent person.

West African Policy.

West African Studies. By Mary H. Kingsley. With Illustrations and Maps. (Macmillan. 21s.)

MISS KINGSLEY'S West African Studies is the most valuable book on the subject that has appeared for a long time. It is a complete summary of all things West African. Anecdotes abound; the chief subjects are, however, a highly interesting and reliable history of early West African discoveries—fetich, religion, witchcraft, native diseases, and medicines. Miss Kingsley is always natural, and often racy. Here is an example of her method of arresting attention. She is writing of driver ants:

I was in a little village, and out of a hut came the owner and his family and all the household parasites pell-mell, leaving the Drivers in possession; but the mother and father of the family, when they recovered from this unwonted burst of activity, showed such a lively concern, and such unmistakable signs of anguish at having left something behind them in the hut, that I thought it must be the baby. . . . "In him far corner for floor!" shrieked the distracted parents, and into that hut I charged. Too true! There in the corner lay the poor little thing, a mere inert black mass, with hundreds of cruel Drivers already swarming upon it. To seize it and give it to the distracted mother was, as the reporter would say, "the work of an instant." She gave a cry of joy and dropped it instantly into a water-barrel, where her husband held it down with a hoe, chuckling contentedly. Shiver not, my friend, at the callousness of the Ethiopian; that there thing wasn't an infant—it was a ham!

The four chapters on fetichism are admirable, but we admit there must be some previous knowledge upon which to work. She carefully analyses the various "schools" of fetich, explains the four souls of which we are possessed when in certain parts of West Africa, and plainly distinguishes between the witch and the witch-doctor. But it is a pity that she did not take Dr. Tylor's advice, which she quotes, anent her having given the name of the religion of fetichism to the entire subject, which properly belongs only to a part. But, setting aside this, we suggest that for the true religion of these people the thoughts of the leaders of their tribal societies must be searched, as we should, in the days of Imperial Rome, have gone to the ancient writers and the priests, and not only to the peasantry and their superstitious customs; and, in spite of what Miss Kingsley elsewhere remarks, we have read and heard of touches of what might be called "savage gnosticism" in certain parts of West Africa, greatly diluted, of course, by negro surroundings, and requiring further and difficult elucidation. Once and for all, however, let us state that we do not believe in the existence of "hideous practices" and "horrible ceremonies" in the secret societies, but in those that, though wild, are grand and mystic; and of these, indeed, there are very few, for the ordinary society is tribal and law-giving. In support of her meaning of the word, Miss Kingsley quotes this as expressing fetichism:

God of the granite and the rose,
Soul of the lily and the bee;
The mighty tide of being flows
In countless channels, Lord, from Thee.

But we should rather say this expresses pantheism. Fetichism, however, is a sequence of animism, and not all animism is fetich. But, as Miss Kingsley aptly remarks: "It is, however, far easier to state what fetich is not than to state what it is." For ourselves, we regret that the word was ever introduced by the Portuguese, with whom came its first meaning, which was not that of animism. However, whatever the name applied to this religion, Miss Kingsley explains herself with regard to its comparative position:

For instance, to a superficial observer, it would hardly seem possible that a Persian and a Mahdist were followers of the same religion, or that a Spaniard and an English Broad Churchman were so. And yet it seems to me that it is only this class of difference that exists between the Africau, the Brahmanist, and the Shintoist.

The description of the first disillusioning shock of grief on a convert from fetichism is terribly pathetic; yet the present writer cannot refrain from mentioning here that the Catholic negro converts struck him in West Africa as being singularly faithful and representative of one's idea of the early Christians. But from the beliefs of the native mind, we turn to what the natives, and apparently others, have seen: indeed, the Society for Psychical Research might do worse than send a deputation to beat the West African bush for wandering gods such as Sasabonsum; for, to quote only one passage, Miss Kingsley relates how—down in the Ogowé region, coming home one night with a Fan hunter from Fula to Kangwe, I saw someone coming down the path towards us, and my friend threw himself into the dense bush beside the path so as to give the figure a wide berth. It was the old symptom. You see what we object to in this spirit is that one side of him is rotting and putrifying, and the other sound and healthy, and it all depends on which side of him you touch whether you see the dawn again or no. This subject of apparition forms is a very interesting one, and requires more investigation.

Miss Kingsley clearly shows that the British race prospers in the unhealthy Tropics until the Home Government drops on it with the Crown Colony system. Read her carefully and you will see this. She quotes those other Crown Colonies as examples, and rather trenchantly observes in reference to the Falkland Islands:

I can say nothing against them, and may possibly be forced to admit that for such a region, off Cape Horn, and with a population mainly of sheep, the Crown Colony system may be a Heaven-sent form of administration. Up to our own day the Colonial Office has been, except in the details of domestic colonial affairs, a drag-chain on English development in Western Africa. It has not even been indifferent, but distinctly, deliberately adverse.

Even Sir George Goldie, to whom we owe the immense Niger Province, would not have succeeded had he been under the Crown Colony system. But, at home,

Mr. Chamberlain alone of all our statesmen saw the greatest possibilities and importance of Western Africa. We want regions that will enable us to keep the very backbone of England, our manufacturing classes, in a state of healthy comfort and prosperity at home in England; in other words, we want markets.

It is impossible to give an adequate idea of this entertaining and most important work, which is the result of great learning and of practical experience. We should say there was an egregious mistake at p. 191, but on a second reading we conclude it is probably only a printer's error—"or" for "of"—for Kakamueha is certainly not another name for Nganga or native doctor, but is probably the name of the place in the Fjorts. This and a few other inaccuracies should have been noticed and inserted on an errata slip.

The Suburbs.

South London. By Sir Walter Besant. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d.)

HAVING given us panoramic histories of London and Westminster, Sir Walter Besant has turned to the vast London which lies south of the Thames. It might be supposed that he would not find there the material on which he has been accustomed to work. His bias is ever toward the scenic and the decorative in history, and what—most people would ask—has South London had of these? But it has much; and Sir Walter goes to work with his old unctious and his untiring industry in collecting and piecing together a rich tapestry. We think, indeed, that he has been kinder to his method than to his subject, and that not even the frankly episodic character of this book can veil its incompleteness.

First, however, let us give and emphasise our praise. Sir Walter brings the monasteries, the palaces, and the pageants of South London before us in sharp outline and vivid colours. The illustration we borrow shows one of these vanished buildings—the residence of Bishop Bonner. Following Sir Walter Besant's glowing pen, we see Henry III. feasting in Kennington Palace, and Richard the Second keeping Christmas at Greenwich; we accompany Henry the Fifth through Southwark to London on his return from Agincourt. In one chapter we are introduced to Sir John Fastolfe, who lived in his great house in Stoney-lane, Southwark, and was as little like Shakespeare's Falstaff as might be. Sir Walter defends this worthy from the charges, brought against him by a writer in the Dictionary of National Biography, that he was a grasping man of business and a surly neighbour. The Canterbury Pilgrims, foregathering at the Tabard Inn, make another pleasant and rechaic picture. But take this tableau of the river and Bankside in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries:

BONNER HALL, FORMERLY IN LAMBETH MARSH.

It is pleasant to think of Bankside and the fields beyond it—the pleasure garden of London. It was easy to get into the open country on every side of the City walls, but there was no place so pleasant as the Lambeth Marsh and the Bankside: none that offered so many and such various attractions. The flag flying over the theatre proclaimed that a play was forward; the number of those who loved the play more than the baiting increased daily; there was never a time when the citizens did not love the green fields and the woods; and these lay behind Paris Gardens and the Bank, beyond the barking of the dogs and the roar of the crowd, and the blare of the music and the stink of the kennels. Every Sunday evening the river was crowded with the boats taking people across to the stairs upon the Bank between St. Mary Overies and Old Barge House Stairs: innumerable were the boats.

Of pleasant, illuminating, and generally accurate matter there is enough and to spare in Sir Walter Besant's book. We say to spare because we think that a good deal of picturesque writing about ancient palaces and pageants and players might well have given place to the more modern history of South London. The royal junkettings and processions in Greenwich and Lambeth were much the same as royal junkettings and processions elsewhere; and their local importance might, we think, have been indicated in smaller compass. Sir Walter might then have found it possible to give the history of suburbs which—as he often remarks, but as often seems to forget—are very modern. It is but eighty-one years since David Cox sketched St. Paul's Cathedral from the banks of a pond in George's Fields at which cows were watered. Yet Sir Walter only glances at the vast South London which has extended southward since. A great suburb like Brixton is barely mentioned, is not even indexed. Camberwell and modern Clapham are in like case. It seems incredible that we should find no account of the "Clapham sect," that fine body of men who imposed an evangelical tone on the Church of England sixty years ago; who sowed Bible societies, missions, and other Christian agencies throughout the world, and are now honoured by no fewer than five monuments in Westminster Abbey. It is odd, too, that we should be told nothing of Bethlehem Hospital, the largest public institution in South London, and the only one, we think, that has been transplanted from North London.

If the South Londoners forget the associations of their neighbourhoods, and "mostly allow the conversation to turn on things connected with the City," why not stimulate them to inquire into Byron's schooldays at Dulwich, and Goldsmith's usher days at Peckham; why not bring before them the literary circles formed by Campbell at Sydenham, by Dr. Lettson at Camberwell-grove, and by the Macaulays at Clapham; and remind them that on Clapham Common Cavendish weighed the world and Turner painted the sunset? Not one of these subjects is dealt with by Sir Walter.

Our author turns a cold eye on the South London of to-day:

It is a city without a municipality, without a centre, without a civic history; it has no newspapers, magazines, or journals; it has no university; it has no colleges, apart from medicine; it has no intellectual, artistic, scientific, musical, literary centre—unless the Crystal Palace can be considered a centre; its residents have no local patriotism or enthusiasm—one cannot imagine a man proud of New Cross; it has no theatres, except of a very popular or humble kind; it has no clubs, it has no public buildings, it has no West End.

There is more magnificence than charity in this characterisation of two millions of people. South London—much of which is not forty years old—will soon have its municipalities. Already it has its newspapers; and its theatres are rising in number and quality. It has keen political clubs. Its temporary exhibitions of pictures are distinctly good. The fame of the Crystal Palace as a musical centre is European. If gorse-covered heaths and leafy lanes have disappeared under the advance of brick, the South Londoners have preserved many parks and gardens with trees. These are the sober facts, and so far as they are unsatisfactory they appear to us to be the logical outcome of youth and circumstance. The hasty treatment and thinly veiled contempt which modern South London receives in Sir Walter's last chapter are surely beside the mark. Mr. Percy Wadham's pretty illustrations should be mentioned as adding a charm to this interesting, if rather one-sided, account of South London.

Notes on New Books.

UNDER FOUR SOVEREIGNS. BY SIR HENRY KEPPEL.

Three weeks after his birth Sir Henry Keppel was placed in his father's foot-pan (he tells us) to be interred in the back garden, not being entitled to a grave in consecrated ground. Just as the screwing-down was to begin, the old nurse opined that there was life in the "small thing." Life!—Sir Henry will complete his 90th year next June. He has been everywhere, and seen everybody, and has put it all down—all, that is to say, up to the year 1876. In A Sailor's Life Under Four Sovereigns he gives us one thousand and twenty-nine pages of daily happenings. Name a day in such a year in such a reign, and Sir Henry will tell you what he was doing on that day in that year in that reign. Spin the roulette of the century and he will answer its whim. We have hundreds of entries as minute as these: "Jan. 15, 1828. Commodore Schomberg hoisted his broad pennant, which was saluted by us.—Aug. 15, 1829. The last day of the races appeared much too soon.—Nov. 30, 1846. Party to shoot. Keeper reserved best ground until too dark—only a small bag.—Nov. 29, 1858. Colliers to dine.—Feb. 3, 1866. Attended Bench, Winchester." The value of this diary does not lie, therefore, in its literary form or its sense of proportion. It lies in the fact that the gallant author has carried out his method with true naval thoroughness. He has compiled a vast straightforward index of his public and private life which can be consulted with interest and, no doubt, actual service by a great many people. The early naval portions of the diary are full of quaint reminiscences, and the more extended entries relating to the author's experiences in the Crimean War, or in the old slaver-chasing days off the Gold Coast, are good reading. STORY OF THE PRINCESS DES URSINS. BY CONSTANCE HILL.

Madame des Ursins' letters to confidential friends, such as Madame de Maintenon, have long been before the world. They now furnish Miss Hill with material for a well-informed, well-written, and very readable study of this remarkable politician in petticoats. A La Trémouille by birth and a Princess Orsini by marriage—des Ursins is but a French translation of the Italian name—Madame des Ursins made her first appearance at the age of nearly sixty in the country whose policy, "behind the flimsy veil of a phantom king," she was destined for twelve years to direct. When Louis XIV. made his grandson, Philip V., King of Spain, and by so doing brought upon himself the war of the Spanish Succession, he sent the lady to be Mistress of the Robes to the new Queen. She became mistress also of the kingdom, and, with some vicissitudes, retained her position throughout the war, restlessly intriguing to prevent Louis from deserting his grandson, and inspiring the feeble Philip to hold his threatened ground. After the peace she fell, partly through the dislike of Philip's second wife, Elizabeth Farnese, "the Termagant of Spain," and partly because her efforts to improve the internal condition of Spain, and in particular to check the Inquisition, had brought her into conflict with the power of the Church. But she had played a great part in days when women, not yet emancipated, could do great things. (Heinemann.)

UNDER THE AFRICAN SUN. BY W. J. ANSORGE.

Mr. Anson, who is medical officer to Her Majesty's Government in Uganda, deals with that country in particular in the pages of this vast book, and as he has travelled it assiduously, and taken photographs the while, he has much to tell and show. His writing is plain and to the point, but it is matter for anthropologists, sportsmen, and naturalists rather than the general reader, who prefers personality to mere record. None the less may the general reader, especially if he be at all interested in curious things, spend some time very pleasantly with this portly volume; while for any one proposing to shoot big game in the same localities it should be invaluable. By way of frontispiece we are shown the author exulting over the carcase of a lion that he has just killed. (Heinemann.)

THE FLOWING BOWL. BY EDWARD SPENCER.

The author, who is known elsewhere as "Nathaniel Gubbins," explains in his preface, dated Christmas Eve, 1898, that the genial reception of his earlier work, Cakes and Ale, together with a wish to earn enough to purchase a Bath Chair, has prompted him to the present treatise on drinks of all lands. Here the convivial may learn how to make most of the beverages of which Sir Wilfrid Lawson disapproves: Cups without number, assorted Punches, including eight varieties of Milk Punch, Ale Flip, Ale Posset, Wassail or Swig, Brown Betty, White Wine Whey, Cider Posset, a Surgeon-Major, a Blue Blazer, a Locomotive, Port Negus, Sherry Egg Nogg, and all the rest of them. The reader who tries all will have need of a Bath Chair too. Mr. Spencer's recipes please us better than his humour, which has not too much delicacy and is of the kind which says "Brethren and sistren." (Grant Richards. 5s.)

A HISTORY OF CORSICA. BY L. H. CAIRD.

Corsica is briefly known to Englishmen as the home of the vendetta, the birthplace of Napoleon, and the notoriety-hunting-ground of James Boswell. Its history, compact of boiling patriotism and cankering feuds, has nevertheless been but thinly presented to English readers; and Mr. Caird's book is intended to remedy this. It does so very thoroughly. The island's grand revolt against Genoa in 1729, and the events that followed it, are fully entered into. Yet Mr. Caird goes so far as to say that not even the Genoese rule caused more misery in the island than the vendetta. The rigour of the custom was so severe, that even when none but children belonging to the belligerent families were left, these grew up with the thirst to slay their hereditary enemies; and "the fatal word 'rimbecco' (a term implying neglect to take vengeance) would inflame once more a quarrel that had been all but forgotten." A careful and interesting history of a fascinating island. (Unwin. 5s.)

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS. BY CHARLES GORE.

It is well to explain that this book has nothing to do with the lectures delivered by its author last Lent in Westminster Abbey. It is a commentary of the kind that demands education in its readers, but not scholarship. In his introduction Canon Gore declares that the controversial positions of the Reformation, in regard to justification by faith, have been antiquated by completer and maturer study, that the Apostle's doctrine has not been generally appreciated in the Church, and that no revival of religion can ever attain to any ripeness or richness unless St. Paul's doctrine resumes its central place. "We know of St. Paul's interior life," he writes, "mainly through the generalised account of it in the Epistle to the Romans." Its crowded confessions he sets himself sincerely to interpret in the modern spirit characteristic of his school; and so to a restatement of the doctrine with which the letter is historically associated. (John Murray. 3s. 6d.)

THE BOOK OF JOB. BY E. C. S. GIBSON.

The purpose of the Oxford Commentaries, a series to which this volume belongs, is to interpret the Books of the Bible, in the light of modern knowledge, to English readers. The series is less elementary than the Cambridge Bible for Schools, and less didactic than the Expositor's Bible; and questions of textual criticism and philology are treated only so far as is necessary for exegesis. Such handling is eminently appropriate to the Book of Job, and Dr. Gibson has admirably restrained himself within its conditions. The structure of the poem is lucidly explained in the Introduction, and the notes are clear and illuminative. The text is that of the last revision; and it is remarkable how the riper scholarship of our own time, by its more perfect appreciation of the Hebrew idiom, has revealed literary beauties that lay hid from the translators of the seventeenth century. Much may be forgiven for the sake of "the eyelids of the morning" (iii. 9), in place of the tamer "dawning of the day" of the Authorised version. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE UNHEEDING GOD.

By T. G. SELBY.

This is a volume of sermons the purpose of which, as might be anticipated, is to convince the reader that the seemingly unheeding God is, in fact, very heedful; that He is not "a languid dilettante [sic], a magnificent Laodicean, a somnolent potentate who is half-hearted in His care for the distinctions between right and wrong." Titles of other sermons in the volume are "The Tragic Schism," "Christ's Antidote to Pessimism," "The Pledges and Obligations of the Creator"; and the subjects are sometimes happily illustrated after the manner of the late Prof. Drummoud. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)

THREE EDUCATIONAL WORKS. EDITED BY E. E. SPEIGHT.

To Mr. Speight is due great credit for the spirited attempt he is making to induce teachers in elementary schools to take up instruction in English literature on a higher plane than has hitherto been reached. To assist them, Mr. Speight is preparing a series of educational manuals in English Literature. Three lie before us: The Temple Reader, a new selection of matter from the best or most interesting authors, with brief information concerning each, and many portraits, the whole furnished with an introduction by Prof. Dowden; The Adventures of Ulysses, by Charles Lamb, with an introduction by Sir George Birdwood, and quaint and informing pictures; and Selections from Wordsworth, with an introduction by the Master of Balliol. Mr. Speight edits the series himself, on definite lines of his own, and the printing and general presentation are excellent. We wish so good an enterprise well. (Horace Marshall.)

THE STUDIO. VOL. XV.

EDITED BY C. HOLME.

The Studio's merits increase. The volume before us quite justifies the opinion that in this magazine we have the best thing in Art journalism that this country has yet done. Every individual native talent in painting or applied art is sooner or later recognised in the Studio, and a sharp watch is kept upon foreign work. In the choice of examples for reproduction the editor displays unflinching taste, and the process employed is satisfactory. We are glad to have in the volume before us two more specimens from the brush of Nico Jungmann, the Dutch painter. (Studio Office.)

We have received from Mr. Dent a copy, in three volumes, of Nicholas Nickleby in the "Temple Edition" of Dickens. To each volume a frontispiece in colour, by Mr. L. M. Fisher, is attached. The taste and skill shown by Mr. Dent in the production of such books is a most valuable force in the publishing world. Even in educational books, such as The Elements of Phonetics and Hints on Teaching German, which come to hand from this publisher, we find the same fastidious but unerring delicacy of treatment.

To the extremely neat and handy Library of Devotion which Messrs. Methuen are issuing has been added Keble's Lyra Innocentium, with an introduction by Dr. Walter Lock, the Warden of Keble College. It is no exaggeration to say that this sweet and fragrant book has never been published more attractively than in its present form.

Fiction.

The Paths of the Prudent. By J. S. FLETCHER.

(Methuen & Co. 6s.)

IN accomplishment, if not in intention, we are inclined to regard these adventures of Dorintha Evadne Clementine Annwell as the best of Mr. Fletcher's various volumes. The fantasia is eminently agreeable, and—save for a certain prolixity at the beginning and a lack of effective climax at the end—thoroughly well done. Dorintha, a foundling, had the luck to fall into the hands of Miss Hypatia Watts, whose "Home for the Upbringing of Prudent Maidens" must have been one of the sights of Warwickshire.

Miss Watts taught her twelve humble pupils the whole art and science of distinguishing on which side one's bread is buttered, and none profited by her instruction better than Dorintha. She went out first as a parlour-maid to a doctor, and then became barmaid in a village inn. Her sentimental transactions with the youth of the village, base and well-born, are set forth at length. She had many admirers, the chief of whom was Richard Bulkeley, son of a baronet and heir to twenty thousand a year. Him she determined to marry.

This is a specimen of Dorintha's methods:

Dorintha smiled, looked about her, and interrupted him.

"But you could tell me that so much better in the wood, dear," she said. "One can't very well make love over a gate, you know."

The gate was opened quickly; she passed through; in a moment they were in the protecting shade of the thick undergrowth, and Dorintha's fears of being observed were relieved. She smiled complaisantly when Richard's arm stole about her waist.

"So you do not refuse to let me make love to you, darling Dorintha?" he said, looking into her eyes.

"But that was why we met, was it not?" she said, with a generous and bewitching air of surprised interruption.

Richard drew her to him and kissed her glowing cheek.

In quite a short while they were secretly engaged. Then a famous music-hall agent on his travels stayed in the village, and, hearing Dorintha sing at a cricket club dinner, told her she might earn sixty pounds a week and more in London. He offered to finance her, but the astute girl foresaw disadvantages in that proposal. Accordingly she went to Richard's father, and parted with her lover's letters and the ring and a written acknowledgment that she had no claim on him; for these she received £500 cash down. So armed she went to London. Things came to pass as the music-hall agent had prophesied, and we leave Dorintha Evadne Clementine, once the prudent barmaid, the brightest star in the firmament of the Strand "'alls," and as prudent as ever.

The comic scenes of village wooing and village toping are contrived with genuine skill, and Dorintha Evadne Clementine Annwell is charming, despite her cold, calculating duplicity.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

SWALLOW.

BY H. RIDER HAGGARD.

A story of the great Trek of 1836. It purports to be narrated by Vrouw Botmar, an old Boer woman. Swallow was her daughter Suzanne, the wife of an Englishman who brought on his head the black hate of Swart Piet. Mr. Haggard here returns to his earlier manner. Love and treachery, witchcraft and fighting Zulus—these play their part as of old. The Haggard rides again, and excitement is in store for his readers. (Longmans. 6s.)

ONE OF THE GRENVILLES.

BY SIDNEY ROYSE LYSAGHT.

Mr. Lysaght is the author of The Murplot. Readers of The Vailima Letters will remember him as a welcome visitor at Samoa. There is freshness and distinction about One of the Grenvilles, which takes its tone and trend from the family motto of the Grenvilles, "Win Love, Lack Gold." The story is laid in Ireland, and both for its characters and setting, and for its author's pleasant wit, this is a novel to read. (Macmillan. 6s.)

BETTY MUSGRAVE.

BY MARY FINDLATER.

This is a novel of almost unrelieved sadness, by the author of Over the Hills. Betty, in the beginning of the book, is a child, and afterwards a woman, doomed to the companionship of a demented mother. On the last page, however, she is happy. The story is well written, and, we fear, true to life. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE AMAZING LADY.

BY M. BOWLES.

A curiously minute and frank portrait of a modern woman with leanings towards decadence. Her relations with two lovers constitute the story. The book is a return to a psychological method which was practised assiduously a few years ago, but is now a little out of fashion. (Heinemann. 6s.)

A STOLEN IDEA.

BY ELIZABETH GODFREY.

The idea was the plot of a novel, the owner Robert Norton, the thief Delicia Watson, the scene of the theft a railway carriage from which Robert stepped out leaving his MS. behind him. He next reads a story built on his own plot in the wilds of the Soudan. The marriage, not the murder, of Delicia is forecasted early. (Jarrold. 6s.)

DAVID HARUM.

BY E. N. WESTCOTT.

A story of American life in a small Eastern township. The central figure, David Harum, is an old banker, honest and shrewd, generous and kindly, but with a public reputation for sharpness and miserliness. The story of how David was cheated over a horse by the Deacon, and how he "got back" on the Deacon again, is a piece of excellent dry American humour. The author died before his book was published. (Pearson. 6s.)

MICHAEL DRED, DETECTIVE.

BY M. C. AND R. LEIGHTON.

Herein we see the unravelling of a mystery which baffled inquiries for many years. The story is constructed with skill, and the reader is off the true scent and on several wrong ones in turn until the very end, so the narrators' end is achieved. Dred is not only a detective, he is also a mau—that is to say, he is capable of error, and therefore comes as something of a novelty in the fiction of crime. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d.)

A SON OF EMPIRE.

BY MORLEY ROBERTS.

For some time Mr. Roberts has been giving us only short stories. This is a long novel. The manner is as vigorous as Mr. Roberts is wont to make it, but the story deals with civilisation and society, and not, as usual, with the ends of the earth. The son of empire was Richard Blundell, and the book tells how, after many vicissitudes, Madge and he came into haven at last and spent their honeymoon in Italy. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE TRIALS OF MERCY.

BY S. DARLING-BARKER.

This novel, by the author of Mars, is bright reading. It might with propriety have been entitled "The Trials of Mercy's Husband," for Mercy is a cynic and a firebrand. The action moves to a Mediterranean island. If it be true that a fool is bent upon a twig, but a wise man dreads a bandit, Mercy's husband was doubly fatuous, for he is ruled by his wife and, when dying, selects a second husband for her in the person of an Italian brigand. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

ODD ISSUES.

BY S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE.

Thirteen short stories, of which the last tells how a woman, being suspected of theft, convicted the real thief and married him—a sufficiently odd issue. The cover of this book is designed as part of a chess-board, with a king in the throes of check-mate. (Smithers. 4s. net.)

WARP AND WOOF.

BY VIOLET HOBHOUSE.

A fresh and charming story of Irish village life. Says an old crone to the heroine: "The men's no worth it. There is na one that's worth the frettin' o' a day, an' I've see mony o' them and ken them weel. . . . Let them be, let them be. They're all of a piece, ay lookin' for a bonny woman to walk ahint them an' grease the wheels o' the cairt to them, till the Almighty stops it at the church door for their buryin'." (Skeffington. 3s. 6d.)

SELAM.

BY MILENA MRAZOVIC.

Mrs. Waugh, the translator of these tales, points out that "the noble and sensitive sons of golden Bosnia and of brave Herzegovina are still classed, together with the negroes of the Congo, simply as 'barbarians.'" It is in protest against this ignorant contempt, and to afford "an insight into the soul of an unknown and, therefore, despised race," that Mrs. Waugh—whose translation of Jokai's Green Book will be remembered—has rendered these eight short tales into English. (Jarrold. 6s.)

GWEN PENRI.

BY JOHN BUXTON.

"A Welsh Idyll" the author calls this tale of the wooing of Gwen Penri by Rowland Cadwallader. The story is laid at Mold, a small town on the Great Western Railway between Chester and Rhyl. The young hero is full of dreams and memories of Welsh and Scottish history, and "in the company of such thoughts he grew strong with the strength which is 'as the strength of ten, because his heart was pure.'" Gwen, on her part, "was born in a home of affluence and piety." In the course of the story she writes a "critical estimate" of Sir Lewis Morris, which the author gives in extenso. (Stock. 5s.)

THE RAPIN.

BY HENRY DE VERE STACPOOLE.

This novel is best described by its "Foreword." "In the rooms of my friend Otto Struve there hangs a parrot-cage, containing a somewhat dejected-looking lark. It was given to him by Gustave Garnier, the man who took the Prix de Rome last year—or was it the year before?—and whose picture of a girl was bought by the State for I do not know how many thousand francs before it had hung a fortnight in the Salon. A story connects the painter and the picture and the bird. . . ." This is the story. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Björnstjerne Björnson.

THE early stories—Synnøve Solbakken, Arne—begun when Björnson was about twenty-five (he was born in 1832), have been judged severely by the younger generation in Norway. It is said that they are not harsh enough for modern enlightenment, too idyllic and romantic. The author himself has left them far behind, along with his variations on the old themes of the heroic age and the early history of Norway:

The colours were all grown faint,
And faint upon their banners was Olaf, king and saint.

There are other songs, or rather other proses. The historian finds in the more recent works of Björnson the influence of popular philosophers, and the effect of an acquaintance with the politics and oratory of the United States. He is one of the old company of the Romantic School; but he has thrown himself without reluctance into the thick of modern fashionable problems. He deals with "questions": his later works may be ticketed as discussions of subjects for a school of social science: many of them, indeed, confess their purpose pretty clearly; for if mischief is hidden in the titles Geography and Love or Flags in Town and Harbour (sold in England as The Heritage of the Kurts), there can be no mistake about such titles as En Fallit, Redaktören, Kongen. "Bankruptcy," "The Press," "The King," are the texts given out by the preacher for whom the Sunday steamers are crowded when he is advertised to speak in any Westland village by the shores of a fjord.

It cannot be said to be easy for foreigners to keep up with his demonstrations; for, on the one hand, they require an intimate knowledge of the temper of various layers of Norwegian society, and, on the other, the complications and solutions of his problems are apt to look amazingly trivial, simply because it is impossible to represent such enormous creatures as "The Press" or "Labour" on so small a stage and with so few persons involved as in the plays of Björnson, or of Ibsen. What would become of Rastignac and Baron Nucingen if their politics and finance were transported, say, to Wales, and prevented from going beyond the limits of that country? The game of the human comedy may be played anywhere, but not all varieties of the game; and part of the ill-success of some Norwegian authors is that they want to play Balzac with the conditions simplified out of all meaning—like trying to play piquet with a pack of twenty cards all under the seven.

Arne Garborg, representing the younger generation, has challenged and encountered Björnson more than once in debate about the Norwegian language and nationality, and, with the language that he has made for himself and an imagination more persevering than Björnson's, has written stories—Bondestudentar, Mannfolk, Fred ("Peace")—which take hold on the mind with a stronger grip than those which gave Björnson his fame. Bondestudentar, the education of a bright country lad into hypocrisy and prosperity, is a sort of antithesis to Björnson's Arne, where the boy grows into the poet of his own land, with the blessing of its kindly elements upon him, and all its rumours of old fables and ballads borne in memory in his poetry. Arne is romance of the purest order, absolute in its devotion to the Norway of the first period after the separation from Denmark, when the yeoman of Norway was a type of resolution and independence, like Wordsworth's men, or like Dandie Dinmont, and the irony of Ibsen had not yet made out Peer Gynt. Luckily, however, Arne Garborg, a countryman's son of Jæderen, has done more than Björnson himself to explain his namesake, Björnson's Arne: the poetry of Arne Garborg does not belie its origin in the same conditions, aerial and intellectual, as the rhymes of the boy in the story. Readers of Björnson will do well not to get rid, just yet, of the little books which came out in 1857 and 1858. The books were young then, and are still young. They do not need to rely on the old romantic conventions, of which there is something, no doubt, in Synnøve and Arne. They rely on the spring of the language, the readiness of the words to put the scene before you, the quick dialogue, the undertone of sympathy as the life of the story weaves itself from one moment to another. This is Björnson's faculty, and even in the dolorous mansions of the Kurts it has not grown old.

BJÖRNSTJERNE BJÖRNSON.

The drama of Paul Lange and Tora Parsberg, translated by H. L. Brækstad (Harper & Brothers), is another "Lost Leader," a subject of the same kind as Garborg's Irreconcilables, which is a document of the history of Norway in 1888. Paul Lange is a "minister of State" (not Prime Minister); he is much given to resigning, and is just going to resign for the third time when the play begins. He is wanted by the Court to do a stroke for the Government by making a speech to bolster-up the Old Parliamentary Hand who is in office at the time, and for this service he is offered (by a wonderful quid-chewing Royal Chamberlain) the post of Ambassador in London. After promising his dearest political friend that he will have nothing to do with the Old One, he goes and makes the speech required by the Court and the Government; the excitement of the patriots at the contradictions in Lange's views is the liveliest part of the play; they—members of the Storting, by name Ramm, Saume, Piene, Balke, with others—refuse patriotically to shake hands with Paul Lange at a party at Tora Parsberg's. Their very natural, if ungenerous, manners appear to shock Paul Lange, and in the last act, being compelled to realise for himself that he is not a success, he goes off the stage with a pistol. The part played by Tora Parsberg in all this would be interesting if it were possible to believe in Lange; but while the political situation has everything in it required for the plot of a classical tragedy, the development of it is too trivial; there is no real force, or anything but the most general and abstract impression of political appetites and envies, in all the splutter of Ramm, Bang, Storm, and the other grisly guests at Tora's party. It is the politics of a boys' school; the dramatic problem will do equally well for a school or a parliament; but if parliament is chosen as the scene, one looks naturally for something rather less callow and crude than the ideas and demeanour of these politicians.

In Jonas Lie's Niobe it is told how a Norwegian matron, finding her sons and daughters growing intolerable through their modern education, exploded them, in the last chapter, with a cellarful of dynamite. Has Björnson tried to imitate that heroic lady? One can scarcely help thinking so, in the relief that comes with the removal of his sheep-like politician. It is a play by a man of genius, and it has realities behind it; why is there not more substance in the hero?

November in Hyde Park.

Look! as the leaves fall fast, and let the tree

Show his soft secret of a close-wove nest,

How it was builded, still and secretly,

And what light love took there its happy rest;

And, presently, those speckled gems which lay

Warmed into light from darkness, day by day:

So, in this autumn of my waning strength,

Drops the concealing curtain of the past;

Soul of my soul! I let you know, at length,

What faithful love I kept, from first to last;

The nest is empty, and the tree is bare,

But we shall heavenly springs and summers share!

EDWIN ARNOLD.

Things Seen.

Exit.

NEAR the Hotel Cecil, men with picks and crowbars are seen against the golden sky. They are wrecking three houses, and the chance of seeing a wall rock, or a man killed, allures a placid crowd. It is the departure of an old street from the Strand. Cecil-street, which begins between Nos. 84 and 85, once ran down to Salisbury Stairs, where the boats bumped and tinkled, and watermen slept in the sun. But now Cecil-street is these two houses, and they are Cecil-street. The old name can still be read.

In Cecil-street men have worked and died these two hundred years. The street was built in 1696 on the grounds of Salisbury House. An archbishop lent it sanctity, and an actor lent it fame. For when Edmund Kean shook the town with his "Shylock" it was to Cecil-street that he hurried to his wife: "Mary, you shall ride in your carriage, and you, Charley, shall be an Eton boy." In Cecil-street Henry F. Cary lived with the shade of Dante in 1816; and here Wollaston, the chemist, kept the vow he had made when "ploughed" in medicine: "never more to write a prescription, were it for his own father." But he earned £30,000 by making platinum malleable.

Merrily the picks are clicking and dinting, and soon of Cecil-street—home of how many tears and triumphs—not one brick will rest on another.

Music.

HE was a very old man, in a hat without a brim, and a pair of horn spectacles; his shoulders were bent, and his boots enormous and broken; yet his voice was cheerful, and he laughed easily as he handed me my hat which a boisterous gust of wind had blown to his feet. Then I saw that he had a violin, which he kept carefully guarded from the weather beneath the lap of his tattered coat.

"Would you like a toon?" he asked.

I would not; but, as he had done me a service, I felt it would be ungracious to refuse. Out came his instrument, and one or two people who had nothing better to do stopped to listen. The first notes were rather doubtful and watery, but after a time I began to recognise a favourite Nocturne of Chopin. As the old man warmed to his work his eyes lighted up, and his back straightened a little: he was evidently enjoying the music if nobody else was.

He had not got much more than half way through the Nocturne when a barrel organ swung round the corner, scarcely thirty yards away, and struck up "Cavalleria Rusticana." The little crowd that had gathered round my old man gradually dwindled away, and when he had finished I was the only one left with him. He sighed, and wrapped up his fiddle again; then he pointed over his shoulder towards the rival performers, and with a sad smile, indicative of boundless pity for his fellow creatures, "Music!" he said scornfully, shrugged his shoulders, and walked away. I think we understood one another.

The Novel.

Talks with Publishers.

WHEN a daily paper gravely publishes an article on "The Fate of the Novel" it looks as if a literary débacle were in the air. We know that this is not so, but it is true that the novel industry is in a somewhat disturbed state.

Publishers and public were alike surprised to learn that the production of novels in 1898 showed a falling off of two hundred volumes, which is at the rate of four a week and represents a decline of 10 per cent. Then came the announcement that we are to have new novels of six-shilling length at the amazingly low price of sixpence. Within a few years, therefore, the publishing prices of new novels have been three—viz., thirty-one-and-sixpence, six shillings, and sixpence.

It reads like the fall of Humpty-Dumpty. Will the last reduction succeed and become general? It is hoped that the effect of publishing a novel at sixpence will be to secure a huge sale. Is this hope justified? And what connexion, if any, has this scheme with the diminished production of novels at six shillings?

To obtain light on these matters, a representative of the ACADEMY has sought interviews with four leading publishers, and he writes as follows:

My first call was on a publisher who is noted for issuing good novels. He said, rather weariedly:

"These questions of price are ever recurrent, and they do not interest me. People are always forgetting that there are two publics—those who buy books as literary possessions, and those who buy books as trinkets or fancies to amuse them for an hour and to be thrown aside. Experiments in cheapness will always be tried on this second public. They do not interest me. Six shillings is a fair price for a good novel—think what a good novel represents in labour and thought and emotion—and a large and growing class of book-buyers are quite willing to pay that sum. Yes, I can conceive that it may pay to issue new novels at sixpence, provided they are very good, and the edition is limited to such a quantity as will just cover the cost and secure a good advertisement. Then these novels could be issued in six-shilling form with profit. But I do not think that second-rate novels can be treated in this way with advantage."

"And what of the falling off in the number of six-shilling novels last year?"

"A matter of chance, I should say—chance. But it does not interest me."

A publisher whose output is mainly fiction said:

"I think the six-shilling novel is in no way threatened. Still, I am now principally engaged in issuing cheaper forms of fiction. I do not think that new novels can be issued at sixpence. The libraries will make havoc of the scheme, for they will put the sixpenny editions into their own bindings, and thus there will be a loss of usual profits to publishers of sixpenny new novels."

My next call was at a West-End house which has issued thousands of novels. A member of this firm said:

"The six-shilling novel stands where it did. But I think the rate of production will go on diminishing for some time. Authors have forced up prices to such a point that we are compelled to reject a great deal of good work. I constantly return novels by writers to whom, under the old thirty-one-and-sixpenny régime, I could afford to pay large sums. Indeed, I have paid £100 or £150 to authors whose books I dare no longer take at any price. Their work is as good as ever, but it cannot contend against the present rush of new work. A sale of six or seven hundred copies was once enough to ensure a profit to the publisher and a handsome cheque to the author; but now the publisher's profits do not begin till he has sold a thousand copies—and that, mind you, against innumerable rival novels."

"Then would you describe novel-publishing as a depressed industry?"

"Well, it has taken an utterly new complexion. The old friendship between publisher and author has gone. Manuscripts are sold practically by auction. An agent will walk in here and say: 'I have been offered £150 for this novel of —'s; will you give me £200?' One thing has not changed—the willingness of the public to pay a fair price for a good article. It is a delusion to suppose that because you publish a book at three-and-sixpence instead of six shillings you will thereby increase its sale. There is no such ratio between price and circulation."

"To sum up?"

"To sum up, six-shilling novels will be fewer and better. As for cheap new novels, I do not see how they can make their way. In the old days cheap novels had a chance, because they were filled with advertisements. But books are dead as an advertising medium, and authors' claims are much higher."

My last call was in Paternoster-row, where one publisher had no fewer than twenty-four six-shilling novels on the eve of publication. He said:

"May I ask whether these are all being published at your own risk and enterprise?"

"Oh, yes. We publish on no other system. No, I do not regard the present state of the novel market as satisfactory. I regret the old thirty-one-and-sixpenny days, and many a good author has reason to regret them. It was a bad day for novelists when the Authors' Society—the boasted friend of writers—threw in its lot with the libraries against the publishers when the question of the continuance of the three-volume novel was being fought out. Their action in this matter is forgotten by many; but there it was. Under the present system only the best writers can make money. No, I do not think that the further cheapening of novels is possible. The public do not want cheaper novels; but they would like better novels. The standard of quality in demand tends to rise, and the task of selecting marketable stuff from the enormous number of MSS. —"

"Enormous, is it?"

"Enormous!"

"How long does it take to decide the fate of an ordinary novel?"

"The time varies, but I should say two months. If a novel does not 'go' in its first two months it means to stay on our shelves."

It is hardly necessary to sum up the evidence. It is clear that six-shilling novels will be produced "until further notice"; that sixpenny novels—like all new and daring innovations—are regarded with scepticism; and that, in any case, the good old times are gone.

Memoirs of the Moment.

WHAT is the best time for writing? The question is a stock one put to authors by the amateur who believes that he could do just as well as they, perhaps better, if he only knew the trick. Mr. Henry James must tremble; his monopoly is gone, because his secret is out. He is a worker by night, and three in the morning finds him still occupied with the creations that were hitherto his, but are now everybody's. Well, he has his compensations, for had he been asleep in his bed the other morning at that hour there would probably have been an end of all things for him. Lamb House, at Rye, in which George III. stayed, and which has been made still more historic by Mr. James's own residence in it, has the faults of its qualities—flues that date back for two hundred years, and are not used, perhaps, to the late hours of an author. The fire which broke out in one of them the other morning quickly brought the householder from his writing-table, the local fire-brigade was summoned, and the flames were got under before any great damage had been done.

ANOTHER American writer, Mr. Julian Hawthorne, once had a rather curious experience with fire. He was seated in an armchair, rather lethargic in body, but with an imagination all alert. He was planning a chapter of a novel in which his hero was to be burnt. He imagined to himself the scene: he seemed to hear the crackling, and to be dazzled by the shooting lights; the smoke seemed to daze him, and he wondered at the bravery of his hero who should bear all this and yet, impelled by some scruple or in obedience to some fantastic sacrifice in the story, should refuse to fly. And the stifling heat—this was really insufferable. The author had imagined it all so well, he was really feeling himself to be singed. Springing up, he rushed from the room—and only in the nick of time. The room was indeed on fire, and the imaginative author had been unaware of the boundaries between fact and fancy.

LORD ROSEBERY has gone abroad, and Sir William Harcourt is in Rome, whither, as they perhaps remember in their dreams, Sir Robert Peel was himself once recalled to take up most unexpectedly the government of England. Lord Rosebery's fate seems to follow him in his retirement. He seeks for peace, and, indeed, pursues it; but just on his heels he can hear the clamour. The Eighty Club will have him, and no other, for its leader; and the resulting discussion and division and correspondence accentuate the differences existing in the Liberal ranks. As with the followers, so with the leaders themselves. Mr. Morley and Sir William Harcourt, far apart from Sir Henry Fowler on Home Rule, and from Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Asquith on Imperialism, are not even themselves united on the Church question, in which Mr. Morley largely accepts the historical view of the Ritualists—a view that is, in Sir William's view, defiant of common-sense. Perhaps all these divergences are more formidable on the surface than deeper down, and many readers of the Peel Papers have been able to appreciate for the first time how utterly out of love with each other were certain members of his Governments in the 'forties. The difference is that they did not divulge their family quarrels as nowadays.

IN these same Peel Papers the political plums have been so many that the newspapers have hardly had space to serve a tithe of them up. This pressure accounts for the crowding out of one or two allusions to literature that have their own importance. In the Tennyson biography it is stated that "the question arose whether Sheridan Knowles or my father should be placed on the pension list. Peel knew nothing of either of them." Then Houghton made Peel read "Ulysses," and Tennyson won the pension. That narrative may be amusing, but it is not history. The application of a pension for Tennyson was made to Peel, at the beginning of 1845, by Hallam, in a letter sufficiently modest in its terms:

The person to whose merits I would solicit your attention is Mr. Alfred Tennyson, whose name must be familiar to you, even if you have never looked at his writings. Perhaps I do not overstate the fact when I say that he is considered by many as the very first among the younger class of living poets. He is at least a man of a fertile and thoughtful mind, and few would hesitate to ascribe to him the high praise of genius. He was the most intimate friend of a son of mine, untimely snatched away.

In confirmation of which testimony he refers the Minister to Mr. Henry Taylor, to Mr. Milnes, and—to Mr. Rogers!

Four days later, Peel wrote in reply that he had read "some of Mr. Tennyson's works and had formed a very high estimate of his powers." Thereupon he offered a gift of £200 to the "man of a fertile and thoughtful mind," not a pension, and meanwhile wrote to Mr. Gladstone for a "character," which came as follows, and which, one must remember, was penned after Tennyson had written what is now generally admitted to be his finest poetry:

Mr. Tennyson is but a young man for a pensioner, I should think under thirty-five. As to his genius, I will not trouble you with any eulogy of mine, but will observe that Mr. Rogers (!) told me he considered him by much the first among all the younger poets of this generation. Secondary and external faults, conspicuous enough, drew upon him some years ago an unfavourable article in the Quarterly. Since that time he has republished, and the general opinion seems to be that he has done much in getting rid of those defects, and that his genius has greatly ripened. Still, it appears established that, though a true and even a great poet, he can hardly become a popular, and is much more likely to be a starving one.

THE fatuity of prophecy is not the point—no one was more sensible than Gladstone in later life to the popular hold of Tennyson on English readers. Seven months later Peel wrote to Hallam, giving a pension to Tennyson of £200 in consequence of the favourable impressions left on his mind by the poems, "confirmed as they are by the highest testimonies I could receive—your own and that of Mr. Rogers!" Acknowledging the poems, Hallam assures the Minister that his "generous consideration" will have "the response of applause from the lovers of poetry, especially the younger of both sexes, who regard Tennyson as the first name among the later cultivators of that sacred field."

O to be in Athens when April is there! For Eleonora Duse will go thither to give D'Annunzio's "Gioconda"; and M. Mounet-Sully, of the Comédie Française, will be there, too, to recite "Antigone." It is not yet quite certain, but there is every chance that, towards the end of the year, Mme. Duse will again visit London, where, however, her two last "seasons" brought her no profit, but, on the contrary, involved her in some slight loss.

MR. S. B. BOULTON, of Copped Hall, Totteridge, Herts., has written to the Times this week to claim for his house a previous tenant or owner in the person of Bulwer Lytton. That is quite true; but there is another historic association with Copped Hall of which its present owner does not make mention. It was in that house that Cardinal Manning was born, and there that he spent the first eight years of his life. Three-quarters of a century later he remembered every inch of the ground when he revisited it—saw where a fence had been moved, an old doorway abolished; pointed out the oak tree which had an owl's nest in it; recalled how a servant who climbed the tree to fetch him an owl fell and broke his leg; and, finding the owls still in possession of the old tree, moralised: "So we go and the owls remain." He saw the lake his mother had made, the tree his father had planted in honour of the jubilee of King George III., and the summer-house which, truth to say, did not gain much glory in his eyes from the fact that Bulwer Lytton, who afterwards rented the place, had written some of his novels in it. It was to a son of the occupant of the house, thus revisited by the Cardinal at the close of his long life, that he gave a piece of advice—an old Balliol man's advice to a very young one: "Read the classics and ride straight to hounds." That was as full a programme as the Cardinal felt free to formulate; but the years have passed and the young man, with a name not unknown, has filled it out for himself.

THE FALLACIES OF UTILITARIANISM AND HEDONISM.

BY "ST. OSWIN."

This is a praiseworthy essay on which White's, or the Waynflete, Professor would find many encouraging things to say. It is orderly, lucid, and well-mannered. We wish, however, that the author had thought himself into greater perspicacity as to the implicates of his main contention. "Does not," he asks, "the hedonistic doctrine of pleasure lead to a paradox? To do an action because of the pleasure it brings is the surest way to lose the pleasure. If a man follows virtue because he seeks the pleasure that comes from it, he will never get it, for the plain reason that he will never have the virtue." Now, "St. Oswin," of course, professes and calls himself a Christian. Does he make nothing of Heaven and the Beatific Vision and Eternal Life? We are aware that certain Christian philosophers have gone so far as to say that "if a man follows virtue because he seeks the pleasure that comes from it, he will never get it"; but they were heretics. Is "St. Oswin" one of those "ungracious pastors" who show the steep and thorny way to virtue? We still consider "pushpin" inferior to poetry. We think we could prove it so to any reasonable being; and reasonable beings alone count when we are exposing "fallacies." We ask "St. Oswin" to consider the lines in which Dante describes the supreme ideal for man. They are loveliest, perhaps, and certainly the most hedonistic, in all literature.

Luce intellettuale, piena d'amore
Amor del vero ben, pien di letizia,
Letizia che trascende ogni dolore.

We find "St. Oswin's" philosophical position quite untenable. It is between the horns of a dilemma. Christianity being saturate with hedonism, we cannot discard Epicurus without discarding Revelation also, and Revelation is the very theorem which "St. Oswin" seeks to vindicate. Nevertheless, although our opinion of his philosophy is no higher than his of the philosophies of Mill and Hume, and other Scots thinkers for whom we ourselves have a high respect, we are not sure that "St. Oswin's" monograph should not be published. We are considering the matter. Our doubts are less ethical than commercial.

A VOLUME OF VERSE.

BY ELTIJÉ.

Last week we had the pleasure of welcoming a volume of verse from South Africa. Now we have one from Gampola, Ceylon. It is pretty verse; but that is the most we can say. The quality of it will be best realised through a quotation.

Nature, seventeen years ago,
Took a rose that it might blow,
Took a lily, white as snow,
Took some violets, so blue,
And a modicum of dew,
Took a little mignonette,
A forget-me-not or two,
Took a bunch of green stuff wet
And a sprig of rue.
And she smiled with approbation
When she named thee—Her Creation!

Now, mark how "Eltijé," instead of mastering his materials, mastered by them. "That it might blow," in the second line, is not the expression of any thought which was in the author's mind; nor is the "bunch of green stuff wet." These phrases are merely put in to fit the rhythm and the metre. The closing couplet is equally bad. Consequently the verse is lifeless. Some of "Eltijé's" other pieces are more natural; but there is too much artificiality in the work to justify our desire to have it published. With every good wish, we suggest to our correspondent that he should pick out what he feels to be the best of his pieces, and offer them, separately, to magazines of belles lettres.

MINUTAL.

BY M. JOURDAIN.

We find wit and scholarship in M. Jourdain's work, much of which is translated from Greek and other classical writers. Of his quite original pieces this pleases us most.

SUN AND SANITY.

The deep field, in the harvest-heat,
Is flecked with traversing sun-bursts, like the hide
Of fallow deer. You hardly hear the whirring
Of cornerakes stirring in the haulms of corn
Blown white against the purple folds of clouds,
The thunder-clouds that cloak the Cumnor hills.
Thin crimson poppies ride on the flickering wheat,
Blown by a wind warm as a nest of birds (Oxford no bigger than an opal ring,
A cup of mist beneath us). And you gain
An infinite satiety of sun
And sleep, and sun-warmed sanity—
And you forget
To read your Paul Verlaine!

That is excellent; but why is it put into a volume of verse? It is writing of a high order; but it is prose. M. Jourdain, we think, was born to be an essayist, or a novel-writer, rather than a poet. Clean-cut thought alone cannot make a poet; but a man who has the gift of it, and an ear for music, should easily make his mark in the less exalted domain of letters.

"No Bigger than a Man's Hand," by "Ferreira"; "Stradella," by E. G.; "As We Pass Along," by "Vida."—Each of these MSS. is too slender to make a volume.

Our Literary Competitions.

Result of No. 21.

THERE has been some difficulty in awarding the prize this week. We offered it for the best set of three mottoes for well-known papers, but in no instance has a competitor produced more than one motto of special merit. We have, therefore, decided to divide the guinea into three portions, one of which has been sent to Mary D. Teale, 2, Belvoir-terrace, Scarborough, for this motto for the ACADEMY:

There is nothing of which we are so liberal as of advice.

(Le Rochefoucauld.)

One to Mr. Alexander H. Caperae, 50, Handen-road, Lee, S.E., for this motto for the Sporting Life:

A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse.

("Richard III.")

And one to Mr. F. Schloesser, 37, Gillingham-street, S.W., for this motto for Truth:

The truth [we] you speak doth lack some gentleness.

("Tempest.")

A selection from the remaining answers is given:

ACADEMY.

Wearing all that weight of learning lightly like a flower.

(Tennyson.) [W. H. D., Norwich.]

Competition No. 22.

A MIDDLE-AGED, unmarried lady, who attends University Extension lectures, subscribes to Madie's, and lives in a London suburb with a parrot, a Pomeranian dog and two servants, keeps on a little shelf beside the fireplace her dozen permanent favourite books. What are they? A collation of all answers sent in will be made, and a prize of a guinea will be awarded to the competitor whose list agrees in largest proportion with the general sense.

Answers, addressed "Literary Competition, The ACADEMY, 43, Chancery-lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, March 7. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found at the foot of the first column of p. 254, or it cannot enter into competition. We wish to impress on competitors that the task of examining replies is much facilitated when one side only of the paper is written upon. It is also important that names and addresses should always be given. We cannot consider anonymous answers.

Summary of the Report presented at the Fiftieth Annual Meeting, held on 2nd March, 1899.

ORDINARY BRANCH.

The number of Policies issued during the year was 64,708, assuring the sum of £6,420,580, and producing a New Annual Premium Income of £353,113.

The Premiums received during the year were £2,967,501, being an increase of £193,237 over the year 1897.

The number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 534,138.

INDUSTRIAL BRANCH.

The Premiums received during the year were £4,960,756, being an increase of £167,165.

The claims of the year amounted to £1,891,039. The number of deaths was 198,308, and 2,181 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Free Policies granted during the year to those Policyholders of five years' standing, who desired to discontinue their payments, was 66,379, the number in force being 604,564. The number of Free Policies which became Claims during the year was 12,231.

The total number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 12,949,679: their average duration exceeds eight and a half years.

The Assets of the Company, in both branches, as shown in the Balance Sheet, are £33,599,708, being an increase of £3,161,371 over those of 1897.

Public attention having been for some time past directed to questions of thrift and provision for old age, the Directors have had under consideration how they can further assist those Policyholders who from age and diminished earnings find some difficulty in maintaining the payment of Premiums on their Policies, and they have therefore made provision for all Policyholders in the Industrial Branch who have been assured for twenty-five years to be free from the payment of further Premiums as they attain the age of 75. This alteration takes effect at once, and has of course necessitated a considerable addition to the Reserves.

Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths, & Co. have examined the Securities, and their certificate is appended to the Balance Sheets.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S SPRING LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

The Thrilling Story of the Adventures of Lieut. Johansen, the sole companion of Dr. Nansen after leaving the "Fram."

350 pages, large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

ILLUSTRATED BY NEARLY 70 BEAUTIFULLY PRINTED PHOTOGRAPHS, &c.

WITH NANSEN IN THE NORTH.

By Lieut. HJALMAR JOHANSEN.

"There is not a dull page in the book, for nothing of interest escaped the attention of the brave and keen-witted adventurer, whilst his forceful and picturesque style is admirably conveyed by the translation."—Manchester Guardian.

"The book, with its great budget of thrilling stories, is as exciting to read as a romance of adventure, and that is a great thing to say of a volume that aims at being a record of practical experiences."—Westminster Budget.

"Not a whit less interesting than the original story of the expedition narrated by its distinguished leader. He (Johansen) has a good deal more to say than mere "ditto to Dr. Nansen," and everyone who is familiar with Nansen's own account will assuredly hasten to make acquaintance with that of the brave and modest comrade who shared his privations and dangers."—The World.

TO BE PUBLISHED MONDAY, MARCH 13TH.

GUY BOOTHBY'S GREATEST WORK.

"PHAROS, THE EGYPTIAN."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, bevelled, 5s. With 12 Full-Page Illustrations by JOHN H. BACON.

One of the most important novels that will be published this spring. "Pharos" is a mystery story, somewhat in the vein of "Dr. Nikola," the style of story in which Mr. Boothby always excels himself, and those few who have had the opportunity of reading the book before its publication pronounce it to be the best its author has yet written.

POPULAR NOVELS BY GUY BOOTHBY.

Uniform with the above, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. each. Profusely Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

"Mr. Boothby has become one of the most popular of English story writers. He can crowd more adventure into a square foot of paper than any other novelist."—Mr. W. L. ALDEN, in the New York Times.

Messrs. WARD, LOCK & CO. BEG TO ANNOUNCE THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT NEW NOVELS

WHICH ARE NOW READY FOR IMMEDIATE PUBLICATION.

MRS. L. T. MEADE'S SPRING NOVEL,

THE BROTHERHOOD OF THE SEVEN KINGS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. With 16 Full-Page Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET. This story relates the adventures of one Madame Koluchy, the leader of a Secret Society called The Brotherhood of the Seven Kings. Written in Mrs. L. T. Meade's characteristic vein, it is full of exciting incidents and thrilling escapades, and of breathless interest from cover to cover.

NEW NOVEL BY M. McDONNELL BODKIN, Q.C.,

Author of "A Stolen Life," "Paul Beck," "White Magic," &c. &c.

T H E R E B E L S.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. Illustrated by J. AMBROSE WALTON.

This is a thrilling historical romance, based on the chief events of the great rebellion in Ireland in 1793. Mr. Bodkin shows a complete mastery of the history of the eventful period with which he deals, and he presents its stirring incidents with dramatic power.

NEW NOVEL BY E. PHILLIPS-OPPENHEIM,

Author of "Mysterious Mr. Snib," "As a Man Lives," "False Evidence," &c.

A MAN AND HIS KINGDOM.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Illustrated by J. AMBROSE WALTON.

This is a stirring romance of modern communism and political intrigue which between them shake to its very foundations the life of a certain remote and disaffected South American Republic. The story should add considerably to the already important reputation of its author.

NEW BOOK BY J. S. FLETCHER,

Author of "Pasquinado," "The Master Builder," &c. &c.

THE DEATH THAT LURKS UNSEEN.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Illustrated by HENSON Byles.

This volume will be cordially welcomed by the thousands of readers who now look forward with the greatest interest for the announcement of any new work by this talented writer. The volume is in Mr. Fletcher's best style, full of humour, pathos, and striking incidents.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

BOOKS OF INTEREST.

An important Addition to the Study of Bird Life by a well-known Writer. Illustrated in the best style and printed on superfine paper.

WONDERS of the BIRD WORLD. By Dr. R. BOWDLER SHARPE. With numerous Illustrations by A. T. Elwes. Beautifully printed on superfine paper. Uniform with "Sweetheart Travellers," "Grimm's Fairy Tales," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

"One of the most delightful and fascinating books that ever delighted a bird-loving reader."—DAILY NEWS.
"Dr. Sharpe is as learned as man need wish to be, and as entertaining as the most brilliant of conversationalists."—COUNTRY LIFE.

OVERLOOKED: a Tale of North Devon. By BESSY HAWKER. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s 6d.

"Everything in this tale is graceful, and the tone and influence of this story is far above the common."—GUARDIAN.
"A very successful bit of work."—BOOKMAN.

MARY GIFFORD, M.B. By L. T. Meade, Author of "A Princess of the Gatter," "Under the Dragon Throne," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

"Mrs. Meade's story shows us plainly what a valuable possession knowledge is in the case of a courageous woman who is not afraid to take her life into her hands and to use it for the good of her fellows. It also shows in the person of Elsie Tomlinson how neurotic disease can be cured by self-forgetfulness in the service of humanity. The story is inspiring and full of interest."—YORKSHIRE HERALD.

A New Novel by the Author of "Three Girls in a Flat."
A HAUNTED TOWN. By Ethel F. Heddle. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. Crown 8vo, fancy cloth boards, 6s.

"The author of 'Three Girls in a Flat' has given us the right to expect good work from her, and has justified expectation. The characters in the tale are all alive, each is individual, none are overdrawn; one, Aunt Petronella, has come to stay with every reader. We do not remember any figure in fiction so touching since Mrs. Clifford's Aunt Anne."—WORLD.
"A simple story charmingly told."—PUNCH.

STORIES from the FAERIE QUEENE. By Mary MACLEOD. With Introduction by Professor HALES. Drawings by A. G. Walker, Sculptor. Large crown 8vo, art linen boards, gilt top, 6s.

"Without exception the most admirable book of the kind which we have seen. The tales themselves from Spenser's inimitable allegory are daintily and vividly told, and the glamour of the old romance rests on each picturesque passing page. The book is beautifully produced, and ought to satisfy the most fastidious and exacting taste."—LEEDS MERCURY.

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., 3, Paternoster Buildings, London.

J. NISBET & CO.'S LIST.

FRAGMENTS of an AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By FELIX MOSCHELES, Author of "In Bohemia with Du Maurier," &c. With 3 Photogravure Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

Mr. Felix Moscheles' reminiscences include recollections of Mendelssohn, of Rossini, of Browning, of Mazzini, and of many other well-known figures in letters, politics, and art. [March 17.]

THE GREAT LORD BURGHLEY: a Study in Elizabethan Statecraft. By MARTIN A. S. HUME, Author of "The Courtships of Queen Elizabeth," &c. With Photogravure Portrait. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

"Highly creditable to the author's judgment and skill."—Times.
"Will take its place among the most notable and authoritative books about the Elizabethan age."—Glasgow Herald.

JOHN RUSKIN, SOCIAL REFORMER. By J. A. HOBSON, Author of "Problems of Poverty," &c. With Photogravure Portrait. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. [Second Edition in the press.]

"A very thoughtful and interesting treatise."—Spectator.
"Mr. Hobson has in this beautiful and heart-searching analysis of Ruskin's teaching made the crooked paths straight and the rough places plain; he has, in fact, synthesised it, so that the man in the street can understand it if he will. No living economist is more thoroughly equipped for the task."—Bradford Observer.

TWO GOOD NOVELS.

THE CLEVEREST WOMAN in ENGLAND. By L. T. MEADE. 6s.

"Exceptionally interesting."—Glasgow Herald.
"Well written, and makes good reading."—Standard.

THE MEASURE of a MAN. By E. Livingston PRESCOTT, Author of "Scarlet and Steel," "The Rip's Redemption," &c. Gilt top, extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"One of the best novels Mr. Livingston Prescott has turned out."—Saturday Review.
"A good romance, full of illusion and with fine effects."—Daily Chronicle.

JARROLD & SONS' LATEST LIST.

JUST ISSUED.

SELAM. By Milena Mrazović.

Translated by Mrs. WAUGH, Translator of MAURUS JÓKAI'S "GREEN BOOK." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt, 6s.

The SATURDAY REVIEW, in speaking of the original German edition, says: "The love borne by Milena Mrazović to Bosnia and its people, whose blood runs in her own veins, has inspired eight stories, offered as an inducement to the outer world to vouchsafe 'a look into the soul of an unknown and therefore despised race.' The result is a book with a purpose as well written as if it had none. It is, however, with a purpose too wide to be hampered by generalities, and has from the beginning of time inspired soul-stirring poetry and entrancing folk-lore. But in our degenerate day it does not often involve anything with so keen and sweet a savour of virgin soil, of so fresh and vital a human interest, as these varied and vivid stories of Bosnian life. . . . The most perfect in a literary sense is the sketch 'Mahmud Baha' . . . 'Born out of Time' is imbued with the very essence of Slav pathos."

READY ON MARCH 16.

JÓKAI'S NEW ROMANCE. THE NAMELESS CASTLE. By MAURUS JÓKAI.

Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt, 6s. "The plot of this, the latest of the great Hungarian romancer's works to be translated into English, is founded on one of the many mysterious rumours as to the fate of the Princess Marie Charlotte Capet, daughter of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI. Round the personality of the youthful Princess there hangs a charm as nameless as the castle in which she passes her relict and secluded life; while the more active members of the dramatis personæ are distinguished by that virile force of character which marks so many of Maurus Jókai's creations. The translator, Mr. S. E. Boggs, has had the great advantage of Dr. Jókai's personal supervision."

MR. KIPLING, we are glad to say, continues to improve in health; but his eldest child, Josephine, who was also struck down by pneumonia, died on Monday. Owing partly to the necessity for keeping this calamity from Mr. Kipling during his present state, and also from other reasons, Mrs. Kipling felt constrained to request that the papers would refrain from treating her little girl's death as a public matter, and they have unanimously complied with the wish. As Mrs. Kipling put it, her husband was the property of English-speaking races, but her daughter was hers alone.

IN thinking of the death of this gifted child, whom friends of the family unite in describing as one possessed of extraordinary charm and character, some lines of Stevenson's have continually recurred to us. With a slight modification they are sadly applicable:

Yet, O stricken hearts, remember, O remember
How of human days she lived the better part.
April came to bloom and never dim December
Breathed its killing chills upon the head or heart.

Doomed to know not Winter, only Spring, a being Trod the flowery April blithely for a while,
Took her fill of music, joy of thought and seeing,
Came and stayed and went, nor ever ceased to smile.

Came and stayed and went, and now when all is finished
You alone have crossed the melancholy stream;
Yours the pang, but she, O she, the undiminished,
Undecaying gladness, undeparted dream.

All that life contains of torture, toil, and treason,
Shame, dishonour, death, to her were but a name.
Here, a child, she dwelt through all the singing season,
And ere the day of sorrow departed as she came.

THE German Emperor's telegram to Mrs. Kipling expressing sympathy for her and her husband has led the German press into a strange error. With few exceptions, the papers consider Mr. Kipling to be an American.

It is left for the committee of the William Black Memorial Fund to decide upon the exact form the memorial shall take. The proposition of the founder of the scheme, Lord Archibald Campbell, was, as our readers know, to place a lifeboat somewhere in the Hebrides or on the west coast of Scotland. But possibly an alternative project may be suggested. At the present moment two officials of the Northern Lights Commissioners are inquiring into the matter. Meanwhile subscriptions may be sent to Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand, the Editor of the Oban Times, or to the Editor of this paper.

THE "boom" in Mr. Charles M. Sheldon's religious stories is real. It succeeds the boom in The Three Musketeers. The London booksellers display seven of these novels—if we are to call them such—viz., In His Steps, Robert Hardy's Seven Days, The Twentieth Door, Malcolm Kirk, Richard Bruce, The Crucifixion of Philip Strong, and His Brother's Keeper. Five or six weeks ago nothing was known of Mr. Sheldon or his books. Then Mr. Allenson, of Paternoster Row, published In His Steps. Many booksellers passed the work by until it began to be asked for. It was like the letting out of water; day after day the mysterious demand grew.

"WHAT is the meaning of it all?" was the question of an ACADEMY representative to a large London bookseller. The bookseller smiled; he seemed amused and cheerful. "Well," he said, "these books will sell enormously; they have reached the chapel-going public and touched them aright, and—well, we are ordering five hundred at a time. These books will be read aloud at mothers' meetings; they will lie on the tables of Y.M.C.A.'s and Y.W.C.A.'s; sermons will be preached on them; and all the provinces will have to be satisfied—Burslem, Cardiff, South Shields. No; I don't suppose the publishers' profits are remarkable. You see, it is like a new brand of marmalade or breakfast oats—the name is in the air, and what one grocer keeps another must keep in self-defence. Thus it is with such books."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "The success which has attended the publication of the Rev. C. M. Sheldon's work, In His Steps, must assuredly swell the coffers of its many publishers, and especially those whose sales are not affected by the royalties which the author is, at least, morally entitled to. It is generally from this side of the Atlantic that the complaint of publishing piracy is heard, so that I anxiously await the verdict of our American cousins on the many editions of the work named above. Such complaint, if any, would not be without precedent."

THE Daily Telegraph's evening edition, to which we alluded last week, is for the time being in the background. The new paper which is receiving immediate attention at Peterborough-court is the Sunday Daily Telegraph, the first number of which is due shortly. A serial story by Miss Braddon will be among its attractions.

DR. BOYD—OR "A. K. H. B.," as he was known to most of his readers—had not of late the following which was his in the fifties, sixties, and seventies. Then his initials were as familiar to this generation as are those of "R. L. S." The Recreations of a Country Parson (1859) established a reputation for good stories and genial criticism of life which Dr. Boyd maintained to the end. Most of the magazines borrowed amusement from his pen, and from time to time the essays were collected. They were not too well written, but the matter was copious and sound and always entertaining. Dr. Boyd may be said to have carried on, to some extent, Dean Ramsay's work.

DR. BOYD was for two years a member of the Committee appointed by the three Scotch Presbyterian Churches to compile a new hymn-book. The Church Hymnary, issued last year, was the result of their joint labours. In one of Dr. Boyd's last letters to the Press he criticised in characteristic fashion some of the textual emendations of the Committee. "In the hearty hymn, 'All hail the power of Jesus' name!' a comma is stupidly stuck in," he wrote, "after the hail. But that is little, though symptomatic. The second verse, best known of all, 'Let high-born seraphs tune the lyre,' is cut out. And in verse three, 'Extol the stem of Jesse's rod' is changed to the unmeaning 'Extol Him in whose path ye trod.' This is unpardonable." "One asks," he went on, "seeing what is in, did anyone propose Walter Smith's 'O'er land and sea love follows with fond prayer'?" It is very beautiful and very brave." Dr. Boyd concluded his letter with a poem, of which we append the first stanza, "which is too unconventional," he wrote, "for any hymnal, and the language what some call Amurrikan. But its spirit is essential Christianity and its literary merit high above half the pieces in the joint hymnal."

W'en you see a man in woc,
Walk right up and say "Hullo!"
Say "Hullo!" and "How d'ye do?"
"How's the world a-usin' you?"
Slap the fellow on the back,
Bring yer han' down with a whack;
Waltz right up, an' don't go slow,
Griu an' shake an' say "Hullo."

In one of his later books "A. K. H. B.," by the way, alluded to Dr. Horatius Bonar as "the sweetest of all living lyric poets."

"BENJAMIN SWIFT'S" new novel, Siren City, is due in the spring. We have already said something of its motive, the conflict between puritanism and paganism. Siren City is the name given by the novelist to Naples, where many of the incidents have place. Meanwhile Mr. Swift is writing a history of Italy in the Middle Ages, in which Machiavelli and Savonarola will figure.

For the advertisement of the new issue of their Popular Educator Messrs. Cassell & Co. have issued a new poster. Everyone will remember the old one—the "Seven Ages of Man"—wherein the observer was called upon to witness the alternative careers for the innocent child as he happened to come under or to escape the influence of the Popular Educator. Once fairly started with a copy of that work his progress through respectable youth, honourable middle age, and blameless senility was assured. Without it, he passed to fraud, excess, and hoary turpitude. In the new picture, of which we give a small reproduction, the same idea is maintained, but with less crudity. It is necessary, however, to be somewhat crude on the hoardings. The new issue of the Popular Educator will be complete in eight fortnightly volumes.

ANOTHER great misconception has been set right. It has been stated that Mr. Joseph Conrad makes the first draft of his stories in a weird language compounded of Yiddish and other ingredients, and then translates it into English. Mr. Conrad does nothing of the kind; nor does he wear three hats.

WE quote from a Boston paper the advertisement of a leading publishing firm as a specimen of the enterprise displayed across the Atlantic in "pushing" a new book:

Milwaukee vs. Boston
As a Literary Center.

A bookseller out in Milwaukee has sold about 125 copies of —, the first book of Mr. — (whom the critics here and in England point out as a writer the literary world will hear much of before long). Had the book been as much appreciated elsewhere it would be alongside of Kipling's The Day's Work as one of the "best selling books" of 1898, instead of being only in its seventh thousand. But in Boston — has not sold at all, though the Boston newspapers, like all the others, have expressed most cordial appreciation of its unusual human interest and dramatic force. We'd like to restore the equilibrium somewhat in this matter, and we know the book can make its own way if people who care for literature will only examine it. We will send any reader of this paper a copy, postpaid, "on approval." After looking it over at your leisure, you can send us either $1.25 or the book. It's a novel on which any publisher would be justified in staking his reputation.

The author of the book in question can hardly complain that his publishers are neglecting his interests.

AMERICA, as we have stated, has taken to Cyrano de Bergerac with extraordinary affection. Not only are thousands of copies sold, but a toy on "Aunt Sally" lines, with the swollen nose of the gallant Cyrano for particular target, is also immensely popular.

THE experiences of authors and other brain workers who work far into the night on a regimen of strong coffee can be curious. Wilkie Collins tells how he persevered at this wicked practice until one night he met himself and deemed it time to turn over a new leaf. Mrs. W. K. Clifford has been telling an interviewer that when she sits up her prevailing fear is burglars. One day she was relating the circumstance to Huxley, who replied: "When I am working at night I not only hear burglars moving about, but I actually see them looking through the crack of the door at me!"

MR. HEINEMANN has just added two more volumes—The Weavers and Lonely Lives—to his edition of the plays of Gerhart Hauptmann. We reproduce the dedication of The Weavers:

I DEDICATE THIS DRAMA TO MY FATHER,
ROBERT HAUPTMANN.

You, dear Father, know what feelings lead me to dedicate this work to you, and I am not called upon to analyse them here.

Your stories of my grandfather, who in his young days sat at the loom, a poor weaver like those here depicted, contained the germ of my drama. Whether it possesses the vigour of life, or is rotten at the core, it is the best "so poor a man as Hamlet is" can offer.—Yours,

GERHART.

Both plays have been translated from Hauptmann's German by Miss (or Mrs.) Mary Morison.

PIERRE LOTI's protest against his superannuation (as Lieut. Viaud) from the French Navy has been successful, and he returns to active service. One result is that he will have to abandon for the present his projected journey through Persia and Afghanistan. The book upon which he is now working is an account of Easter Island in the Pacific.

FRANCE is a country of statues, and yet, in spite of the national pride in Victor Hugo, not a single statue of him has yet been erected. At Besançon, his native town, a statue committee was formed in 1885, but only £800 has been raised for the purpose in all these fourteen years. A sculptor is, however, now at work, and probably the memorial may be ready in two years time. But the delay is very odd.

THE French paper Les Annales has been making a list of the words which French polite Society has recently borrowed from this country. Here are a few:

Sport	Rush	Mail-coaches	Toast
Trainers	Starter	Toilet-club	Speech
Jockeys	Winning-post	Lavatory	Fast
Turf	Pedigree	Tickets	Swell
Ring	Winner	Meeting	Five o'clock
Bookmakers	Stud-book	Take tea	Leading articles
Plungers	Pull-up	Smoking	Reporters
Thoroughbred	Tramways	Baby	Home
Broken down	Victorias	Boy	Nursery
Dead heat	Cabs	Groom	Select

THE following story of R. L. Stevenson has been told before, but it is worth repeating. It occurs in an article on Dr. Murray's dictionary in Good Words, and is apropos of the vigilance of the staff. Stevenson was applied to for the meaning and origin of the word "breaan" in one of his tales. To which the romancer replied that he had not read the proofs of the book, and "breaan" was merely a misprint for "ocean."

THE humorous compositor is very noticeable in two of the March magazines. In the Pall Mall Magazine he makes Mr. Quiller Couch refer to the child poems of "Mr. William Cannot," meaning Mr. William Canton; and in the Bookman he entitles an article on Mr. William Watson "Mr. Watson's Collected Pomes."

IN Truth for this week will be found a selection of replies sent for a prize competition, wherein readers were asked to treat the preparation of well-known books somewhat as Mrs. Beeton treats the preparation of dishes. We give a few specimen recipes: The Open Question—

SOLES "À LA QUESTION OUVERTE."

Take a pair of young souls, and carefully skin.
Dissect them, examine without and within;
Preserve all the essences selfish and vain,
Add a dash of heredity, passion and pain;
Mix well with depressions of divers degree,
And flavour with Ibsen and felo-de-se;
Dish up with a garnish of turquoise and lace,
Then serve in a boat, and push out into space.

Concerning Isabel Carnaby, by Miss E. T. Fowler—

CARNABY CREAM.

Take a Methodist family, charming and wise,
That looks upon life with the kindest eyes,
Add men of the world, clever women as well,
And Love, the great teacher who trained Isabel;
With original thoughts in apt phrases and fit,
Mix repartee, epigram, genuine wit;
Let humour and "gentlehood" flavour the whole,
Then daintily serve in a clear crystal bowl.

With Kitchener to Khartum, by Mr. G. W. Steevens—ENTRÉE KHARTUM À LA STEEVENS.

Have ready a Kitchener, first-rate and complete,
Take a great deal of sand and a little tinned meat,
New fellahen grit and fine old British pluck,
Sufficient of foresight and a slice of good luck;
Stir up with a rail, and mix well with Nile water,
Season with blood and with Maxim guns' slaughter,
Frizzle it all in a tropical heat,
And serve the B. P. in a halfpenny sheet.

The Castle Inn, by Mr. Stanley Weyman—

Take a tutor, some youths, and a bold baronet,
Mix them all with haut ton and with many a bet;
Add a vulgar grande dame and a maid with eyes bright;
Then do them all brown, in a carriage, at night.
Serve hot, with a statesman, a lawyer, and proctor,
And to aid your digestion pray send for Pitt's doctor.

The Christian, by Mr. Hall Caine—

QUAYLE À LA CAINE.

Take a Storm in a tea-cup and flavour with Manx,
With some bad upper ten and some clerical cranks;
Add the Derby, some Scripture, the first at St. Paul's,
And serve it up hot, with some spice from the Halls.

Bibliographical.

THE next two volumes of the "Bibelot" series started by Messrs. Gay & Bird will, I gather, be made up of selections from the verse of Herrick and the prose of Leigh Hunt. What a pity it is that the editors of classics for the people do not go farther afield for their material! The late Mr. F. T. Palgrave turned out a selection from Herrick which holds the field. Leigh Hunt's prose is even more accessible. His Men, Women, and Books, his Imagination and Fancy, and his Wit and Humour are still in the market in a neat and handy form. Moreover, Mr. Arthur Symonds edited a selection from Hunt's essays in 1887, and Mr. R. Brimley Johnson did the same thing the year after. Now, a reprint of The Religion of the Heart or of Sir Ralph Esher would be of real interest at the present time. How many, think you, have read those works? To how many are even the titles thereof known? By the way, those students who want to make themselves acquainted with the products of Leigh Hunt could not do better than begin with the book called Leigh Hunt as Poet and Essayist, edited by Mr. Charles Kent just ten years ago. In this we have a large percentage of Hunt's "choicest passages."

The notices and "appreciations" of A. K. H. B. have been rather scanty and perfunctory; and for an excellent reason—there was practically nothing to say that the genial cleric had not already said more than once. There never was a more autobiographical person than A. K. H. Boyd. He was for ever taking the public into his confidence—not only in his avowed Recollections (Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews, and so forth), but, virtually, in all discourses of his which were not sermons. Even into his sermons did the Ego creep. The Recreations of a Country Parson are just forty years old. Since then A. K. H. B. has skilfully rung the changes on that theme. Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson, Autumn Holidays of a Country Parson, Critical Essays of a Country Parson—these came in rapid succession. Having once got the ear of the reading public, A. K. H. B. never lost hold of it. Note the cleverness of the titles he gave to his books—so many of them chosen, it would almost appear, in order to persuade the public that the Country Parson was an English, and not a Scottish, clergyman.

Within the last week or two there has been much thumbing, we may be sure, both in England and in America, of the extant works of Rudyard Kipling. Many biographies have been written for the daily press, and, happily, have not been published. Meanwhile, young as Mr. Kipling is, one would like his writings to be the subject of a bibliography. I remember making his acquaintance first of all in an edition (the third, I think) of his Departmental Ditties, accessible in England in 1888. In the same year came Plain Tales from the Hills, and the astonishing succession of booklets in paper covers, entitled Soldiers Three, The Phantom Rickshaw, Under the Deodars, and so forth. These, I take it, were the first forms in which Mr. Kipling's short stories originally figured in these islands—under the auspices of Anglo-Indian firms. It was really not till 1890 that Mr. Kipling came directly and deliberately before the English public with The Light that Failed. Then we had Life's Handicap, and Barrack-Room Ballads, and Many Inventions, and so on.

What a pity it is that the brother of James Smith, of Rejected Addresses fame, has always been known as "Horace"! As a matter of fact his baptismal name was "Horatio," and I think I am right in saying that he always styled himself so. Now it so happens that there is a worthy police magistrate, baptised (I take for granted) Horace Smith, and, like the elder Horace, a dabbler in rhyme and rhythm. This gentleman, our contemporary, has published Pilate's Wife's Dream, and other Poems (1860), and two volumes of Poems (1889 and 1897), and Interludes (of, I believe, prose as well as verse) (1892-4). How hard upon him that he should be mistaken at any time for one of the authors of Rejected Addresses, the more especially as he is really entitled to sign himself "Horace" and his predecessor wasn't. Let us try to think of the joint author of Rejected Addresses as Horatio Smith.

The Elizabethan Stage Society is going to give a representation of Mr. Swinburne's Lochner. Well, that play, albeit in five acts, will not greatly tax the Society's resources, for there are in it only seven interlocutors, and, the locale being Ancient Britain, the Society should not be largely worried about scenery or costumes. Nevertheless, how will the play be mounted? In the Elizabethan fashion, I suppose; or else what has the Elizabethan Stage Society to do with it? The dialogue, you will remember, is in rhymed couplets—somewhat of a novelty, I fancy, for Mr. Poel's youthful and engaging amateurs.

Commenting upon the fact (or the rumour) that Mr. Andrew Lang is writing an "introduction" to The Three Musketeers, a brother gossip remarks that Mr. Lang is "one of the best Dumasians in the land, as the epistle to Alexander in his Letters to Dead Authors helps to prove." An even more striking testimony to Mr. Lang's fondness for Dumas is to be found in his book called Essays in Little, originally published by Messrs. Henry & Co., and now issued, I believe, by Messrs. Longman. Therein may be seen quite a long discourse on Dumas, in which I seem to detect a certain Thackerayan echo—an echo I fancy I detect in a good deal that Mr. Lang has written.

A good many years ago I read, in Phillips's Life of Curran (I think), the following story: "There is a celebrated reply in circulation of Mr. Dunning [afterwards Lord Ashburton] to a remark of Lord Mansfield, who curtly exclaimed at one of his legal positions: 'Oh, if that be law, Mr. Dunning, I may burn my law books!' 'Better read them, my lord,' was the sarcastic and appropriate rejoinder." I was amused, the other day, to find this very rude repartee ascribed, not to Dunning, but to the late Lord Herschell.

We are to have a new English Life of Nicolas Poussin, by way of rivalry to Lady Calcott's. So far, the English biographies of Poussin have been few, but his works have not been without a certain amount of celebration. Thus, he figures in a folio of Original Designs edited by J. Chamberlaine in 1812, in another folio of Studies from Nicolas Poussin published in 1814, and, again, in a collection of Engravings Illustrating the Sacred Scriptures issued, also in folio, in 1833.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

An Analyst of the Soul.

Alladine and Palomides, Interior, and The Death of Tintagiles.

By Maurice Maeterlinck. "Modern European Plays" Series. (Duckworth & Co. 2s. 6d.)

It is customary with many prejudiced people who have no idea of what they are missing to accuse M. Maeterlinck of obscure symbolism, and pass him by, or give him but languid attention. Day after day his books are falling (you may almost hear them drop) from the hands of persons who, striving after the hidden meaning which rumour alleges to lurk in every line, give up in despair. "He is too hard for me," says one. "I dislike mysticism," declares another. "It is all so impossible," cries a third; "I want plays that deal with life." And all the time the meaning is on the surface, and this clear-eyed, penetrative Belgian thinker is dealing with the core of life with unaffected lucidity and unswerving directness. For the author of the three plays that lie before us, and the others that have preceded them, is among the realists: with this difference from writers who usually achieve the term, that his realism is the realism of the naked soul, theirs more often that of the body.

The body is not much: 'twere best Take up the soul and leave the rest—

that might be M. Maeterlinck's motto for his work. He takes up the soul and leaves the rest. Or, rather, he does not leave the rest, but treats it as something not essentially relevant. The delights and pains of the body are here, it is true; but that these wistful and lissome damsels and love-lorn men sleep and eat and take exercise never occurs to us. While their souls are intensely vital and busy, their bodies are very much the bodies of a tapestry design.

When we say that M. Maeterlinck takes up the soul and leaves the rest, we mean that he is realist only with the soul, and self-indulgent idealist with the rest. It is his passion for strange beauty that prompts him to invent his wildly romantic scenery, his incredible fortresses, with their subterranean outlets on vast and formidable oceans, their myriad windows and crumbling towers, their resounding passages and far-reaching gardens. It is his passion for strange beauty that prompts him to give all these low-pulsed, exquisite women musical names and intoxicating hair, and to make all these delicately distinguished men kings or princes or knights of perfect carriage. These are the liberties we must allow genius. But when M. Maeterlinck comes to the real business of the dramatist, to the display of the mind at work, in bliss or torture, and all the pains and joys of which man is capable, then farewell to liberties and personal gratification. M. Maeterlinck straightway becomes stern realist. The machinery may be fantastic, but the human nature is exact. The body is a detail beside the soul in its nakedness. We hear, as it were, not words, but murmurings of the soul vocal, without the need of physical lips. We are beyond, above, the body.

It matters nothing to M. Maeterlinck where his dramas originate: the most ordinary divorce or breach of promise case would provide him with material; he would so treat it that, while the external features of the thing were shorn away, the essence of the tragedy would be there, distinct and terrible. We do not say that the words employed would be the language of life, but the thoughts, emotions, and impulses at the back of them would be the thoughts, emotions, and impulses of life. Human nature is the same in all time and in all places. M. Maeterlinck paints human nature—self-abnegation and charity, love, jealousy, and revenge, cruelty and gentle solicitude, sorrow and suffering, the wisdom of old and the impetuosity of youth; and if it pleases him to play the while with external unrealities as setting for his dramas, that pleasure must be conceded him.

But even in these settings he is not always fantastic. The central drama in this book—"Interior"—is lifelike throughout, in conditions as well as in psychology. It may, indeed, be particularly recommended to those persons whose idea of M. Maeterlinck's art is most wrongheaded. The story is simplicity itself. A young girl has been drowned, possibly by her own volition, and an old man is deputed to break the news to her family. He stands irresolute in the darkness of the garden, accompanied by a stranger, watching the family through the window. The father sits by the fire; the mother fondles a little sleeping boy; the two sisters work at their embroidery. All are happy and unsuspecting. Meanwhile the old man and the stranger talk together, and their words and silences tell everything. Here is a passage illustrating at once M. Maeterlinck's sympathetic insight into all gentle and sorrowful minds that, through suffering, have gained wisdom, and his strange power of suggesting impending calamity, the sense of disaster. The Old Man is speaking:

"Yesterday evening she was there sitting in the lamp-light like her sisters; and you would not see them now as they ought to be seen if this had not happened. . . . I seem to see her for the first time. . . . Something new must come into our ordinary life before we can understand it. They are at your side day and night; and you do not really see them until the moment when they depart for ever. And yet, what a strange little soul she must have had—what a poor, artless, unfathomable soul she must have had—to have said what she must have said, and done what she must have done!"

THE STRANGER: "See, they are smiling in the silence of the room . . ."

THE OLD MAN: "They are not at all anxious—they did not expect her this evening."

THE STRANGER: "They sit motionless and smiling. But see, the father puts his finger to his lips . . ."

THE OLD MAN: "He points to the child asleep on its mother's breast . . ."

THE STRANGER: "She dare not raise her head as for fear of disturbing it . . ."

THE OLD MAN: "They are not sewing any more, there is a dead silence . . ."

THE STRANGER: "They have let fall a skein of white silk . . ."

THE OLD MAN: "They are looking at the child."

THE STRANGER: "They do not know that others are watching them."

THE OLD MAN: "We, too, are watched . . ."

THE STRANGER: "They have raised their eyes . . ."

THE OLD MAN: "And yet they can see nothing."

THE STRANGER: "They seem to be happy, and yet there is something—I cannot tell what . . ."

The approach of the villagers bearing the body at last makes it necessary to break the news. We see, through the window, the blow fall on the family, and that is all. The arrangement is perfect, the effect indelible.

The two other plays, "The Death of Tintagiles" and "Alladine and Palomides," are less simple. "The Death of Tintagiles" is too pitiful: we are not satisfied that the end justifies the means. "Alladine and Palomides" belongs to the same class as "Pelleas and Mélisande." We will not recount the story here; but there is one scene which must be mentioned. Palomides is betrothed to Astolaine, the king's daughter, but Alladine so allures him that he is forced, even against his will, to be faithless. Astolaine forgives him in a beautiful, poignant passage, of which this is a portion:

PALOMIDES: "I know what it is that I lose; I know that her soul is the soul of a child, of a poor and helpless child, by the side of your soul: and for all that I cannot resist. . . ."

ASTOLAINE: "Do not weep. . . . I too am well aware that we are not always able to do the thing we prefer. . . . I was not unprepared for your coming. . . . There must indeed be laws mightier than those of the soul, whereof we forever are speaking . . . (she suddenly kisses him). But I love you the more for it, my poor Palomides. . . ."

PALOMIDES: "I love you too. . . . More than her whom I love. . . . Are you crying too?"

ASTOLAINE: "They are little tears, . . . let them not sadden you. . . . My tears fall because I am a woman; but women's tears, they say, are not painful. . . ."

M. Maeterlinck has given us many beautiful women, and Astolaine is with the first. Only a mind of extraordinary purity and depth could have devised her. Of M. Maeterlinck's dramatic methods there may be many opinions, but of his penetrative appreciation of the best and loveliest of which mankind is capable, of his comprehending pity for the unhappiness of sensitive natures, and of his delicate gift for expressing those thoughts which most of us can only half articulate—conscious that they hover near, but unable quite to grasp them—there can be but one.

It should be added that these three plays appear in the series of Modern European Plays edited by Mr. Brimley Johnson and Mr. N. Erichsen. The translations, which have ease and grace, are by Mr. Alfred Sutro ("Alladine and Palomides" and "The Death of Tintagiles") and Mr. William Archer ("Interior").

Art and Democracy.

Angels' Wings. By Edward Carpenter. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

AMONG those whose ideal it is to remould the world "nearer to the heart's desire" there are, we believe, many who look to Mr. Edward Carpenter as a leader and a seer. The present volume, which consists of "Essays on Art and its Relation to Life," is, of course, only indirectly concerned with schemes of social reconstruction; but we look with some interest to see what sort of place it is that Mr. Carpenter reserves for art in the renewed, revitalised democratico-socialistic community of the future. The book is undeniably an attractive one. Mr. Carpenter is not one of those Socialists who would break with the past and consign it to oblivion. He has genuine reverence for, and considerable capacity of appreciating the masterpieces which the human spirit has so far succeeded in creating. And though his historical surveys and generalisations occasionally strike us as lacking in depth of knowledge, yet he is throughout fertile in new and suggestive points of critical departure. The key-note of his attitude to the questions he deals with is struck in the opening words of the first essay. It is a feeling "that the Democratic idea as it grows and spreads will have a profound influence on Art and artistic matters; and that Art, in its relation to life generally, is in these days passing into new phases of development." To foretell and analyse the lines along which this influence and this development is likely to proceed is the main object which, with some discursiveness and many departures into special inquiries, he keeps before him throughout. So far as we disentangle his answer, it is something as follows. In the perfect life there will not be a very large place for Art, for life itself will be beautiful. "But before that it is more than possible that there will be a great outburst of special art production, inspired chiefly by the splendours of the coming sunrise. Of this outburst Wagner, Millet, and Whitman are the great fore-runners. (Shelley is the lark which almost before dawn soared from the darkened earth.)" This art-production, transient as it is apparently expected to be, will naturally look forward rather than back. Its characteristics will be those which the new life itself, according to Mr. Carpenter, is to bear. That is to say, it will combine individuality of expression with a sense of the unity and solidarity of the race. Mr. Carpenter does not conceive of triumphant democracy as something which will tend to crush out the individual. All true art, he tells you, must convey "a contagion of feeling" from the breast of the author to that of his audience, and to effect this the author must seek "to arrive at the most direct expression of something actually felt by himself as a part of his own, and so part of all human experience." Mr. Carpenter would fetter expression with no artificial bonds; on the other hand, he would not deny it the use of conventions, so long as these are dominated and do not dominate; for, in accepting tradition, the artist is "in touch with that immense field of the Collective Consciousness of the race, which is, in fact, Religion, and from which the individual (however great his genius) may not stray too far." For, in a democratic state of things, a true individualism is at root a true collectivism. "The deeper one goes into himself the nearer he must come to the Common Life." And so Art is really a force that makes for union.

She will perceive that her function consists in something much more real, more positive: that it consists in actually drawing human beings together, revealing to them mutually their own feelings, their own inner life and consciousness, and the sentiment of every object, every event, as it relates itself (through the individual artist) to the great thrilling, palpitating soul of all mankind. For the first time the sense of this great soul is dawning consciously upon us. All life will be worked in—the most lonely, the most complex, the most inaccessible subjects, in order that they may wake response in the few that can understand them; and again the simplest and most universal, and in the simplest forms, in order that their portrayal may make the whole world kin. To make mankind realise their unity, to make them feel it, that will be the inspiration and the province of Art.

Such is the backbone of Mr. Carpenter's speculations about art in democracy. We leave the criticism of it to those who are more convinced than we are that philosophic discussion of "the what and the why" of art is a very profitable thing. We have ourselves been on the whole more interested in some of Mr. Carpenter's subsidiary essays, and in particular in that which gives its name to the volume, and in which he considers the various devices adopted by artists of all ages to give plausibility to their conceptions of winged angels and winged beings of the human type generally. We must confess that Mr. Carpenter's difficulties have never troubled us, and do not really trouble us now that he is suggesting them. Our mind is so constituted as placidly to accept the symbolism, without inquiring too closely whether the clothes of a winged angel would come off, or the muscles and articulations necessary to move the wings would be an anatomical contradiction in terms. Mr. Carpenter, however, has worried over it, and produces evidence to show that really great artists put their winged figures in such a position that the absence of muscles and articulations is not noticeable, or frankly meet the difficulty by strapping the wings on, as in the case of the traditional presentments of Hermes. This essay is illustrated by a series of interesting photographs, which include Perugino's St. Michael from the National Gallery and a beautiful bronze Hermes from Herculaneum.

As a specimen of Mr. Carpenter's style at its best the following passage may serve. It is a description of the Panathenaic frieze on the Parthenon at Athens:

The workmanship is so naïve, so spontaneous, so joyous, so unconscious-proud in its strength and its skill. The whole scene moves again before us—the young warriors on horseback or on foot, in the beauty and pride of manhood; the horses themselves champing at the bit; the chariots so well made, so swift; the elders and councillors of the city, in sober raiment and bearded wisdom, bearing olive branches; the beves of maidens with baskets of offerings to their prototype, the virgin goddess; the cattle decorated for sacrifice, the drovers, the artisans, the slaves—all dedicated—the lives of the warriors, the wisdom of the old men, the hearts of the women, the work of the toilers and the blood of the beautiful animals—to her who is the common life of them all, Athené, the soul of Athens.

Mr. Carpenter is by no means always so good as this. Occasionally he is slangy; and his description of a figure in a picture of Carlo Dolce's at Florence as "a middle-aged beau with lardy-dardy whiskers" displeased us mightily. But obviously he has real gifts as well as an individual point of view.

A Chicago Philosopher.

Mr. Dooley: in Peace and in War. (Grant Richards. 2s.)

WE have already said something in the ACADEMY in praise of Mr. Dooley, and now that his book in its completeness is before us we can only ratify that commendation. Mr. Dooley must be added to the acquaintances of all who esteem good sense and good humour.

The scheme of the book is simple. Mr. Martin Dooley is a Roscommon Irishman who settled many years ago in Chicago, and now keeps a liquor saloon in the Archey-road, in the heart of the Irish quarter. Every night Hennessy and other of his friends step over for a "hot wan," and to them Mr. Dooley holds forth. He has his opinions on everything that happens, and in spite of some ignorance of detail, he has the knack of hitting the centre. His greatest gift is the witty Irishman's capacity to improvise satirical situations and dialogue. Here and in other ways he reminds us of Mulvaney. Mulvaney's brogue is more creamy, for American influences have tampered with Mr. Dooley's; and Mulvaney's remarks are more humorously kindly, for Mulvaney was a humanist, whereas Mr. Dooley, in conversation at any rate, is a cynic and a destructive critic; but the two men stand together. In selecting Mr. Dooley for his mouthpiece the author of this trenchant book—whom we have already stated to be Mr. Finley Peter Dunne—has shown much acumen, for no one is in so fine a position to say true things of Anglo-Saxons, whether in England or America, as the Irishman who dwells in their midst and is yet not of them. Yet Mr. Dooley, however shrewd his thrusts may be, always saves himself a flash of rectifying humour, so that his weapon while it pierces your side tickles you too.

For English readers the section of this book entitled "In Peace" will be the more attractive, for many of the remarks on the progress of the American-Spanish War are esoteric, although well worth attempting none the less. In the "In Peace" section Mr. Dooley discourses of New Year resolutions, of Football, of Golf, of Books, of Charity, of the Dreyfus Case, of the Decadence of Greece, of the New Woman, and many other matters equally interesting to Englishmen as to Americans. Here is Mr. Dooley on Books:

"'Tis all wrong," said Mr. Dooley. "They're on'y three books in th' wurruld worth readin'—Shakespeare, th' Bible, and Mike Ahearn's histhry iv Chicago. I have Shakespeare on thrust, Father Kelly r-reads th' Bible f'r me, and I didn't buy Mike Ahearn's histhry because I seen more thin he cud put into it. Books is th' roon iv people, specially novels. Whin I was a young man, th' parish priest used to preach again thim; but nobody knowed what he meant. At that time Willum Joyce had th' on'y library in th' Sixth Wa-ard. Th' mayor give him th' bound volumes iv th' council proceedings, an' they was a very handsome set. Th' on'y books I seen was th' kind that has th' life iv th' pope on th' outside an' a set iv dominos on th' inside. They're good readin'. Nawthin' cud be better f'r a man whin he's tired out atther a day's wurruk thin to go to his library an' take down wan iv th' gr-reat wurruks iv lithratehoor an' play a game iv dominos f'r th' dhrinks out iv it. Anny other kind iv r-readin', barrin' th' newspapers, which will niver hurt anny onedycated man, is destrhuctive iv morals."

"I had it out with Father Kelly th' other day in this very matther. He was comin' up fr'm down town with an ar-rmful iv books f'r prizes at th' school. 'Have ye th' Key to Heaven there?' says I. 'No,' says he, 'th' childher that'll get these books don't need no key. They go in under th' turnstile,' he says, laughin'. 'Have ye th' Lives iv th' Saints, or the Christyan Dooty, or th' Story iv Saint Rose iv Lima?' I says. 'I have not,' says he. 'I have some good story books. I'd rather th' kids'd r-read Char-les Dickens than anny iv th' tales iv thim holy men that was burned in ile or et up be lines,' he says. 'It does no good in these degin'rate days to prove that th' best that cau come to a man f'r behavin' himsilf is to be cooked in a pot or di-gisted be a line,' he says. 'Ye're wrong,' says I. 'Beggin' ye'er riv'rince's pardon, ye're wrong,' I says. 'What ar-re ye goin' to do with thim young wans? Ye're goin' to make thim near-sighted an' round-shouldered,' I says. 'Ye're goin' to have thim believe that, if they behave thimsilves an' lead a virchous life, they'll marry rich an' go to Congress. They'll wake up some day, an' find out that gettin' money an' behavin' ye'ersilf don't always go together,' I says. 'Some iv th' wickedest men in th' wur-ruld have marrid rich,' I says. 'Ye're goin' to teach thim that a man doesn't have to use an ax to get along in th' wur-ruld. Ye're goin' to teach thim that a la-ad with a curlin' black mustache an' smokin' a cigareet is always a villyan, whin he's more often a barber with a lar-rge family. Life, says ye! There's no life in a book. If ye want to show thim what life is, tell thim to look around thim. There's more life on a Saturdah night in th' Ar-rehy-road thin in all th' books fr'm Shakespeare to th' rayport iv th' drainage thrustees.'"

We wish we had room to quote more of Mr. Dooley's opinions. Mr. Dunne, it may be remarked, is still continuing the series in his paper, so that a new volume may, probably, be expected before long. Mr. Dooley, for shrewd common sense, is worthy to take his place as a national satirist beside Hosea Biglow.

Gabriel Harvey Redivivus.

On the Use of Classical Metres in English. By William Johnson Stone. (Frowde. 1s.)

THE history of the attempts to naturalise classical metres on a Saxon soil has been a somewhat irritating one. The pundits of Gabriel Harvey's Areopagus, who tried the thing, or thought they tried the thing, broke down. This was partly because the real poets amongst them—Spenser and Sidney to wit—found it on the whole more interesting to write poetry than to make metrical experiments, and partly because of their failure to distinguish lucidly and accurately between the essential natures of accentual and quantitative verse. To some extent the same failure has persisted. The present century has seen many hexameters, of which probably the best are to be found here and there in Clough's Bothie of Tober na Vuolich, and a few elegiacs. But these have been almost uniformly accentual, and not quantitative. They have assumed, as a basis, that a classical dactyl, or succession of a long and two short syllables, can be represented in accentual verse by a succession of one accented and two unaccented syllables, and similarly that a classical spondee, or succession of two long syllables, can be represented by a succession of two accented syllables. Owing, however, to the comparative rarity with which accented syllables immediately succeed each other in English, the accentual spondee has frequently been replaced in practice by an accentual trochee, or succession of one accented and one unaccented syllable. On this basis it is, of course, perfectly easy to write, and even to read with pleasure, hexameters. But this is not in the least what Mr. Stone means when he asks us to write classical metres as the classical writers wrote them. He proposes that hexameters should be strictly quantitative, that the rhythm should depend on quantity, and not on accent at all, and that accent should be reduced to the subordinate place which quantity itself now holds in our own accentual verse. Examine an English line, and you find that, although the syllables long in quantity are frequently, perhaps generally, also the accented ones, yet this is by no means invariably the case. Sometimes an unaccented syllable is long, and then a warring of accent against quantity is set up. A precisely similar warring takes place in classical metres, only here the positions are reversed. The accent frequently falls on the long syllables which govern the rhythm; exceptionally it does not.

Before we give some examples of Mr. Stone's exotic metres, let us say that his essay is quite one of the most lucid and scholarly treatments of its subject with which we are acquainted. He poses the whole problem of the nature and relation of quantity and accent admirably. Especially we wish to endorse the weight he lays on the often disregarded fact that English syllables, like classical syllables, have definite quantities of their own, and are therefore capable of being classified for metrical purposes, if desirable, as longs and shorts. With regard to another of his theories, that metrical accent is not voice stress or emphasis, but a raising of musical pitch, we are more doubtful. The view should be supported by considerations drawn from the nature of musical accent and the way in which verse is set to music by composers. Sidney Lanier, if we remember right, went over this ground in a forgotten volume.

Mr. Stone claims that his only real predecessor in writing strictly quantitative hexameters in English has been the learned and ingenious Mr. James Spedding. Here are Mr. Spedding's lines:

Verses so modulate, so tuned, so varied in accent,
Rich with unexpected changes, smooth, stately, sonorous,
Rolling ever forward, tide-like, with thunder in endless
Procession, complex melodies—pause, quantity, accent.
After Virgilian precedent and practice, in order
Distributed—could these gratify th' Etonian ear-drum?

Virgil my model is: accent, cæsura, division
His practice regulates; his rules my quantity obeyeth.

The reader must scan for himself, remembering that a syllable may be long through the position of the vowel before more than one consonant, as well as through its nature, and that he must leave the accent in its proper place, and not forcibly transfer it to the long syllable. It must be "ä'f'tēr Virg'ilīān," not "ä'f'tēr Vīrg'ilīān." The second example is Mr. Stone's own, and is elegiac:

Came hither, Heraclitus, a word of thy death, awaking
Me to sorrow, and I thought upon how together
We would see the sun out sweet-counselling: all that is of thee,
Dear Halicarnassian, long, long ago is ashes;
But thy nightingales will abide with us; on them of all things
Else the coming ravisher will not ever set his hand.

Obviously it would not be fair to judge the new prosody by the actual achievement of these specimens. The pioneers are feeling their way painfully in a strange land. To a classically-trained ear there is probably a real pleasure in the marked clashing of accent and quantity, whether in Greek, Latin, or English. But few ears are classically trained, and, interesting as Mr. Stone's experiments are, we do not at heart believe that quantitative scansion will take root in English verse. Just as nations have the government they deserve, so—and even more so—they have the prosody which really fits their tongues and throats and gratifies their ears. And for the Teutonic folk, since the days when the Emperor Julian heard the songs of the Germans, like the dissonant cries of birds, by the waters of the Rhine, that prosody has been accentual, and not quantitative.

The Referendum.

The Referendum in Switzerland. By Simon Deploige.
Translated by C. P. Trevelyan, M.A.; and Edited by Lilian Tomn. (Longmans. 7s. 6d.)

Among the less reflective democrats of to-day no shibboleth is so blessed as the word referendum. The impatience of second chambers, and, indeed, of more representative bodies, tends to quicken the desire of the people for a more direct voice in legislation and administration. This growing democratic spirit has manifested itself in demands for the referendum, by which constitutions, laws, or resolutions are referred from chambers of representatives to the popular vote. There are many who cherish the amiable delusion that men are naturally good, and that the millennial day will dawn when the sovereignty of the people is realised in direct legislation. Yet Rousseau, the great sophist of democracy, long ago confessed that, though men always desire their own good, they are often deceived and do not discern it.

For five centuries the people have voted on ordinary laws in certain Swiss cantons, and in States of the American Union it has been the practice to refer constitutional changes to the people for ratification. The referendum has been advocated in various forms in the French, Italian, and Belgian Chambers, and it has appeared in the programmes of German Socialist Congresses. In England, rudimentary examples of it have been found in the Trade Union world, as well as in the metropolitan Public Library pollings. The plebiscites on liquor prohibition in Canada, and on the establishment of a Federal Constitution in Australia (not Australasia, as the editor terms it), are recent instances of the direct popular vote. Just lately the readers of an English Socialist newspaper have declared that the referendum and the popular initiative should hold the first place in a scheme of political reform.

It may, then, be fairly urged that the present volume possesses actuality, and appears at an opportune time. It brings out clearly the special political features of Switzerland, and shows that the Swiss referendum is an organic growth—the product of special historical conditions—and an integral part of a peculiar constitution. Switzerland differs in a great variety of ways from States like England or France, and only political empiricists can feel confident that the institution would prosper on an alien soil. The referendum is by no means a simple contrivance, and the number of possible permutations of which it is susceptible is extraordinary. The unique political character of Switzerland, the forms of the referendum adopted in that country, the difficulties attendant upon their working, and the results obtained, are all clearly exhibited by M. Deploige, supplemented by Miss Tomn. The ordinary voyageur en Suisse can have but a vague idea of the complex political machinery prevailing throughout the cantons; and knows not that, amid all the mazes of the strangely heterogeneous constitutions, the direct vote of the people controls affairs alike in the Federal Assembly and in the humblest local body.

The section on the Popular Initiative introduces to the English reader a subject much less familiar than the referendum itself. The initiative is the right of a number of electors to propose a new law, or to demand the repeal or modification of an existing one. The referendum is hedged in with restrictions, and often has a negative result; but the initiative is a more direct and positive appeal to the people. It can be demanded at any time, and practically there are no limits to the subjects it may deal with. The results obtained from the application of the referendum and the initiative testify to the frequent apathy of the voters, or to their liability to be governed by a narrow utilitarianism. Passion, personal interest, party spirit, religious bias, and many other factors influence their decisions. The general results are conservative.

KHARTOUM CAMPAIGN, 1898.

BY BENNET BURLEIGH.

Mr. Burleigh adds one more vivid narrative of Lord Kitchener's campaign to the three or four we have already read. Two features one may note. Mr. Burleigh warmly emphasises the services rendered by Colonel Macdonald, whose rewards he considers inadequate. On this point it is not for us to offer an opinion. Colonel Macdonald's heroism and soldierly skill are beyond question, perhaps beyond praise. We merely remark, as a matter of criticism, that there is a certain bathos in Mr. Burleigh's reliance on the Dingwall North Star for a record and eulogy of Colonel Macdonald's career. Surely this is to belittle the very man whom Mr. Burleigh desires to honour. The other feature is a "Postscript," in which Mr. Burleigh replies to Mr. E. N. Bennett's notorious article in the Contemporary, entitled "After Omdurman." This is sad reading for plain men. It seems that in the multiplying of war correspondents there is darkening of counsel. Mr. Bennett—as everyone knows—declares that the wounded were shamefully killed after the battle of Omdurman. Mr. Burleigh, whose denial we wish to believe, says this charge is "abominable," and that Mr. Bennett has "scarcely a nodding acquaintanceship with truth." Doubts of the kind raised by these opposing authorities can be finally and logically laid to rest only by an exhaustive and impartial inquiry. Failing that, one's beliefs go with one's wishes and prior convictions. Therefore Mr. Burleigh wins so far as the conditions allow. But the real quarrel is between Mr. Bennett and the Army; Mr. Burleigh's scoldings are too personal. (Chapman & Hall. 12s.)

PHILADELPHIA.

BY AGNES REPLIER.

"A quiet town," exclaims the author as she surveys the Philadelphia of to-day. "Something that was given to the infant city as she lay cradled between her two rivers remains with her still, some leaven of modesty, some legacy of soberness and restraint." These words are nearly the last in Miss Repplier's book. You may turn back and dip and verify. In its first days Philadelphia was absurdly happy: all religions were tolerated, and all journeymen tailors had twelve shillings a week and their board. To be sure, these heavenly conditions were oft menaced. Party feuds, hooped petticoats, and Indians had to be suppressed. Then came Franklin, half sage, half huckster, a bore for ever and ever, with his patent stoves and his lightning-rods and his punch-bowl and his militia and his "Proposals Relating to the Education of Youth in Pennsylvania" and his stories of Paris. "Too much Franklin" is the reader's cry long before page 329, where he is told that "in 1824 was founded the Franklin Institute," as though Philadelphia were not one entire and perfect Franklin Institute already. The War of Independence and the period of Philadelphia's regency, when Washington gave his severe receptions, and set his watch daily "by Clark's standard at Front in High-streets, gravely saluting the porters who uncovered as he passed," are described as brightly as possible, as might be expected from one of the best women prose writers now living. It is balm in Gilead to learn that the city which proclaimed Independence still disburses rent to the English descendants of William Penn. A very pleasant, womanly, and vivacious book. It should be read with Mrs. Earle's Home Life in Colonial Days. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d.)

ROSES AND RUE.

BY ALICE FURLONG.

A slender book of Irish poems and poems of nature, by one who loves her land. Irish poems that are inspired by passionate patriotism cannot but have the true note, however crude they may be. Miss Furlong's, however, are not crude; and her lyrics of the open air have a freshness that is always pleasant. We quote, for its timeliness, the first stanza of a pretty song on the seasons, "The Year's Children":

SPRING.

She is mild, she is mild!
Creeping up the chilly lanes
In the silver of the rains.
All her hair is April-wild.
But a hint of golden May
Hides in tresses blown astray.
For the love of this young child
Blooms the daffodil
And the primrose on the hill.

A book which bears the impress of a delicate and kindly personality. (Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE CITY OF DREADFUL NIGHT, &c. BY JAMES THOMSON.

Mr. Bertram Dobell, who was one of Thomson's close friends and is the editor and publisher of this little volume, states that he has made the selection in response to an appeal for a cheap edition of Thomson's works. In his interesting preface Mr. Dobell explains his principle of selection, and tells again something of the poet. "Even those," he says, "who were quite incapable of estimating his intellectual qualities were charmed by his genial manner, his pleasant talk, and good fellowship." Such poems as "Sunday up the River" and "Sunday at Hampstead" illustrate this side of Thomson's nature; but readers of the title-poem will need to be reminded that it existed. Among the poems added to those printed in the first edition of "The City of Dreadful Night" are "Weddah and Om-el-Bonain," "A Voice from the Nile," and that perfect piece of lyrical criticism, "William Blake." The volume is small and comely, and while Thomson's admirers will be glad to have it, it should attract to him new readers. (Bertram Dobell. 3s. 6d.)

ADAM SMITH.

BY HECTOR C. MACPHERSON.

It is always probable that a life of a political economist written by a political economist will discuss political economy. But it is a little appalling to find Mr. Macpherson saying in his brief preface: "The reader will notice how profoundly I have been influenced by two thinkers—Spencer and Bastiat." Cheerfully we skip every page and line in which we might acquire proof of this fact, our tastes inclining us to an acquaintance with Adam Smith the man, not the influence of other men on his biographer. Of Adam Smith the man there are some interesting stories in this little volume, the latest addition to the "Famous Scots" series. With all his grasp of mind, Smith was one of the most unpractical and absent-minded of men. We are told that his "tendency to reverie" interfered with the discharge of his duties as Commissioner of Customs for Scotland. Once, when invited to Dalkeith Palace to meet a distinguished statesman, he began to gabble in disparagement of his fellow guest. When reminded of the situation, he blushed, but could only mutter in his confusion: "Deil care, deil care; it's all true." One morning he stepped out into his garden at Kirkcaldy, clad only in dressing-gown, and, forgetting this fact, walked to Dunfermline, where he arrived just as people were going to church. Adam Smith was wedded to self-communing; yet in later life he enjoyed the society of that Edinburgh to which, Gibbon said, "taste and philosophy seemed to have retired from the smoke and hurry of the immense capital of London." He had £600 a year salary from the Customs and a pension of £300 from the Duke of Buccleugh. We like a story of his last visit to London. Pitt was anxious to meet the author of The Wealth of Nations. A dinner was arranged at Dundas's house, Addington, Wilberforce, and Granville being present. Smith came late, and the whole company rose to receive him. "Be seated, gentlemen," said Smith. "No," replied Pitt, "we will stand till you are first seated, for we are all your scholars." (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 1s. 6d.)

THE STUDY OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. BY CHARLES A. BRIGGS.

Dr. Briggs, who is a Professor of Biblical Theology in a New York seminary, lectures from the altitude of one who has suffered for the faith which he professes. From his Introduction we learn that he has gone through a season of persecution at the hands of his own familiar friends. He would seem to have lived down the intemperate orthodoxy of these well-meaning persons, and here he takes appropriate vengeance in a vast book of some 700 pages. What he has to say of the general results of modern criticism—and it is not so very terrible—he tells in such a manner as should interest an earnest audience of aspirants to the ministry and stir up in them a spirit of liberal inquiry. Among the American divines who most readily opened their eyes to the new light he quotes the memorable name of Mr. Preserved Smith; and for valuable assistance in the preparation of this much elaborated version of a book which first saw the light some years ago, he renders respectful thanks to his daughter, the Rev. (?) Emilie G. Briggs, B.D. (T. & T. Clark. 12s. net.)

THE TRIUMPH OF THE PHILISTINES. BY H. A. JONES.

Mr. Jones prefaces to this edition of his comedy another of his lively polemical prefaces. This time it is not Mr. William Archer that serves as butt, but once again the buffeted, yet indifferent, British Public. Mr. Jones explains the origin and motive of his play. The origin was his amusement at the spectacle of congregations all over the country joining every Sunday in singing the Psalms of so deplorably undesirable a monarch as David and perceiving no incongruity the while. The motive was the emphatic illustration of the wisdom of the text in Ecclesiastes: "Be not righteous over much; why shouldst thou destroy thyself?" But unfortunately, as Mr. Jones admits, he was so much taken with his moral that he forgot to make a good play; hence "The Triumph of the Philistines," produced in May, 1895, was a loss to Mr. George Alexander. It is, however, fairly amusing reading. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d.)

A DIARY OF ST. HELENA. EDITED BY ARTHUR WILSON.

The writer of this diary was Clementina Elphinston, the wife of Sir Pulteney Malcolm, who commanded the Cape Station while Napoleon was at St. Helena. Many of Napoleon's conversations which it records have been reported, and those which have not yield nothing particularly fresh. But Mr. Wilson was justified in making this modest book out of Lady Malcolm's papers. The sketch of the Emperor they afford is lifelike and interesting. On p. 21 we find Napoleon discussing Ossian's poems with Lady Malcolm. "He said he admired them very much, particularly Durthula, and inquired if the controversy about their authenticity was decided; and whether Macpherson had really written them. He laughed on her replying with quickness that Macpherson was not capable of writing them. . . . She asked him if he had read the poems in a French translation? He said there were two. He had them both, but they were not good. The Italian was excellent, beautiful. She said that they had been more admired on the Continent than in England. He exclaimed with energy: 'It was I,—I made them the fashion. I have been even accused of having my head filled with Ossian's clouds.'" (Innes & Co. 5s.)

Fiction.

Two Men o' Mendip. By Walter Raymond.
(Longmans. 6s.)

IN its way this tragic idyll is a perfect piece of work. It follows the course of a little lie to a great disaster without confusion or excess of detail, and softens an effect which might easily have been over-harsh and grim by charming sketches of landscape and touches of comedy. The scene is Somerset; the time, 1813. A man could be hanged for sheepstealing then, and it is small wonder that here and there the would-be victim of a robber, by invoking the law that punished after so terrible a fashion, brought down dire vengeance on his own head. Mr. Raymond's readers are not utterly alienated from the "groover" who slays Joseph Pierce, or the farmer who suppresses evidence of the deed; for the one is avenging his father and the other is afraid of the criminal's friends. But fear sits ill on so stalwart a figure as the John Winterhead of this story, and a conscious breach of faith to the dead man who had eaten his salt proves a far-reaching influence for evil on his life. Better certainly that his hayricks should have blazed than that "Little Patty" Winterhead should have fallen in love with a murderer. We will not lift the veil further, but enough has been disclosed to show how sternly logical is the retribution imagined by Mr. Raymond. All the characters speak the pleasant rustic dialect which the author of Gentleman Upcott knows so well. We find one of them, Emily Jane, giving the heroine a "piece of white crochet work" on her birthday. The design thereon was easily recognised. "'Why, 'tis the little Zammle, to be sure,' smiled Cousin Selina. . . . 'La! an' so 'tis,' they all agreed at once. 'An' look at his little eye; so natural like,' said Aunt Maria with tender feeling; for Cousin Selina's Emily Jane, artist as she was, had worked a round hole where the eye ought to be, and the expression of spirituality thus given to the countenance was truly wonderful."

A Girl of the Klondike. By Victoria Cross.
(Walter Scott. 3s. 6d.)

"VICTORIA CROSS" is a young novelist who now for some years has been showing promise without arriving at any actual performance. Her first work, a fragment of some length, which appeared in The Yellow Book, narrowly escaped being notable. No one could fail to see that here was an author gifted with strong imagination—an imagination, however, which its owner could not hold in check. And to this day "Victoria Cross" has not mastered her imagination. With her, to compose a novel is to be dragged breathless at the heels of a power which has never come under discipline. She cannot write; she cannot shape; she cannot exercise control. She is the mere imperfect instrument of a force.

In the present book we have a rushing, burning narrative of a goldfields tragedy, culminating in revolvers and death. The heroine is impossible, the two lovers are impossible, and the Klondike is impossible—being, in all probability, a Klondike of "Victoria Cross's" too exuberant dreams.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the week's Fiction are not necessarily final.
Reviews of a selection will follow.]

LOUP-GAROU!

BY EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

Ten stories of West Indian life, by the author of Children of the Mist. In the first a theft is attempted by a "misshapen living thing—half-man, half-ape. The moonlight showed its hairy body, outlined its shaggy ears, and played like white fire in its round eyes." Noel Warne promptly shot it, and it turned out to be Roger Warne in masquerade. But the thrill comes first. An awesome picture of the scene serves as frontispiece. Among the other stories is one called "Obi Man." The tone of the book is gruesome. (Sands. 6s.)

THE CAPSINA.

BY E. F. BENSON.

A little while ago Mr. Benson gave us The Vintage, a romance of the Greek War of Independence at the beginning of the century. He now adds a companion story, wherein some of the characters of The Vintage reappear. The Capsina did not want for vigour: "He [Mitsos] saw the Turk's lips curl in a sort of snarl, and he put his hand to his belt a moment too late, for the next the Capsina's knife had flickered down from arm's length to his throat, and the butt of her pistol caught him on the temple. He fell sprawling at her feet, and she had to put one foot on his chest as purchase to pull the knife out again." (Methuen. 6s.)

LIFE AT TWENTY.

BY CHARLES RUSSELL MORSE.

A very long novel, ranging over various ranks of society, and full of matter. The hero is a gardener and botanist, and he talks like this: "Picture your typical bachelor-gruff Benedict before he realises the awful depths in the pitfall; imagine him affianced, fighting established fact with established habit; and then, association of ideas victorious over ideas of association, see him dividing his rooted morbidity to cover two hearts, generous to a fault in refusing his wife's optimism—if she has any." A careful work. (Heinemann. 6s.)

ATHELSTANE FORD.

BY ALLEN UPWARD.

An eighteenth-century romance, privateering, fighting, and love being the ingredients. The story moves to India, where Clive is introduced, and the battle of Plassy described. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE HERMITS OF GRAY'S INN.

BY G. B. BURGIN.

The Hermits are six men who band themselves together in a vow of celibacy. One is called Fireworks, another The Scribe, another is Albert Quigge, and all have been jilted. One, however, Panton Dare, broke his vow and married. The story skips humorously on, helped out by the quaint remarks of Mrs. Pag, a talkative Cockney. "The only way to lure a real gentleman out of bed," she says, "is to come and strip the clothes off, and nobody but his own mother can do that, even though he's as blind as Julius Ciesar when he landed at the seaside." (Pearson. 6s.)

MISS NANSE.

BY SARAH TYTLER.

Another story by this popular and very productive novelist. Miss Nanse was Miss Nanse Fotheringham, a dressmaker at Pitaird, the little Scotch town where the scene is laid, and there is a certain Cranfordy character of description of her, her sister, and some of the other personages of the story and place. Subsequently comes a romantic element, with mystery and wickedness, skilfully managed by the practised pen. (Long. 3s. 6d.)

OSWALD STEELE.

BY EIBBON BERKLEY.

"The soft light of a lovely autumn afternoon stole through the window of the sacristy of St. Mary's Church; it fell on the figures of a young girl and a priest—fair sinner and stern saint. The former was seeking absolution at the hands of the latter, according to the new ritual of our Established Church"—such is the beginning. Tangled lives and religious questionings follow. (Long. 6s.)

COUSIN IVO.

BY MRS. ANDREW DEAN.

A pleasant, smartly written novel about a will. The hero goes to Germany on a mission to discover the heirs, and finds adventures, wife, and fortune. There are brightness and movement in every page. (Black. 6s.)

THE MORMON PROPHET.

BY LILY DOUGALL.

The hero is Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism, and the author's aim has been to present him as he is revealed in his own writings, in the writings of his contemporaries, and in the memories of the few who can recall him. The novel is also a contribution to psychical research. (Black. 6s.)

THE PRESIDENT OF BORAVIA.

BY GEORGE LAMBERT.

A tale of South African politics and a discovery of Jesuit treasure, with the proper element of love-making. Exciting reading. (Chatto. 6s.)

KNAVES OF DIAMONDS.

BY GEORGE GRIFFITH.

This story deals with Illicit Diamond Buying in South Africa. According to the Diamond Laws stolen gems must be found on the person or in the possession of the suspect before a conviction can be obtained. "It is just here," says the author in his preface, "that the most exciting and fascinating part of the art and industry of I. D. B. . . . comes in. There are, indeed, not a few who have found fortunes in South Africa . . . who can look back to anxious moments, big with fate, which made all the difference to them between the broad-cloth of the millionaire magnate and the arrow-marked canvas of the convict I. D. B." (Pearson. 3s. 6d.)

A WEAVER OF RUNES.

BY W. DUTTON BURRARD.

A rather jerky story of Anglo-Indian life by a novelist with high spirits. Although in one conversation we are treated to an explanation of "The Lady of Shalott," the book is bright and readable. (Long. 6s.)

THE TREASURY-OFFICER'S WOOING.

BY CECIL LOWIS.

The Treasury-officer is Rupert Waring, and he is stationed at Tatkin in Upper Burmah, where Ethel Smart has come to stay with her brother, the Deputy-Commissioner. The life of the station is admirably drawn by Mr. Lowis, and the love-story holds, without exciting, the reader. A most readable novel. (Macmillan. 6s.)

UNTIL THE DAWN.

BY S. E. WALFORD.

A military novel turning on the murder of the hero's mother by an unknown hand, and the hero's life-long resolve to know the truth. The characters are varied and interesting, and include a colonel's wife who "plays with fire," aided unconsciously by a fatuous husband who says: "I never claimed to be a genius, but there is one subject I thoroughly understand, and that is woman. Give them their little luxuries and amusements, and most of them will run straight. Comfort has far more to do with the matter than principle. I have always been a sceptic as to the restraining power of moral teaching." (Chapman & Hall. 3s. 6d.)

DEPOPULATION.

BY HENRY WRIGHT.

In this "Romance of the Unlikely" the author attacks the "corner" system, which he represents as the curse of America. The picture of Gabrielle Metzler's wealth and his gigantic operations is interesting. The story ends with a revolution, in which the millionaire system perishes and the more equal distribution of wealth is secured. (George Allen.)

THE LOVE-LETTERS OF MR. AND MRS. BROWNING.
 "ONE OF THE MOST CHARMING LOVE STORIES IN THE LANGUAGE."
PUNCH.
FIRST EDITION EXHAUSTED.
SECOND EDITION READY IN A FEW DAYS.

With 2 Portraits and 2 Facsimile Letters, 2 vols., crown 8vo, 21s.

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING AND ELIZABETH BARRETT BARRETT.

* * These Volumes are uniform with "The Letters of Elizabeth Barrett Browning."

Spectator.—"We venture to think that no such remarkable and unbroken series of intimate letters between two remarkable people has ever been given to the world.....There is something extraordinarily touching in the gradual unfolding of the romance in which two poets play the parts of hero and heroine."

Saturday Review.—"We have read these letters with great care, with growing astonishment, with immense respect; and the final result produced on our minds is that these volumes contain one of the most precious contributions to literary history which our time has seen."

Academy.—"Many good gifts have come to English literature from the two Brownings, husband and wife, besides those poems, which are their greatest. The gift of one's poems is the gift of oneself. But in a fuller sense have this unique pair now given themselves by what we can but call the gracious gift of these letters. As their union was unique, so is this correspondence unique.... The letters are the most opulent in various interest which have been published for many a day."

Immediately. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ETCHINGHAM LETTERS.

By Mrs. FULLER MAITLAND,

CONFORMITY AND CONSCIENCE.

By the Rev. W. PAGE ROBERTS, M.A., Canon Residentiary of Canterbury, Author of "Law and God," "Liberalism in Religion," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Subjects:—CONFESSION—ABSOLUTION—HOLY SCRIPTURE—ATHANASIAN CRED—DAMNATION, &c., &c.

Record.—"The value and excellence of this volume are beyond dispute, able, strong, fearless, genuine, spiritual, it will be read by many with deep interest, and will repay them with no little help and encouragement."

Academy.—"The Canon of Canterbury shows with humorous ingenuity that such stumbling-blocks as priestly absolution and the unkind threats of the pseudo-Athanasius need constitute no bar to religious communion with the most primitive or the most rationalistic of Puritans."

Spectator.—"Mr. Page Roberts's thoughtful and able sermons will, we are sure, be a source of help and strength to many readers, and deserve special praise and support at a time when the spirit of compromise, or to give it a higher name, the wider Christian charity, so greatly needs to be kept in constant remembrance."

NOTICE.—A FOURTH EDITION is NOW READY OF Spring Announcements Supplement.

SATURDAY: MARCH 11, 1899.

The Spring Season.

A Dialogue on New Books.

WHAT is the most noticeable thing about the spring announcements?

The most noticeable thing is the amount of good reading that we shall soon be able to buy for sixpence. Tennyson's poems, for instance—whoever heard of Tennyson for sixpence?

How much Tennyson?

"Maud," at any rate, and "Enoch Arden," and most of the earlier poems. And, in addition to reprints, there are to be new sixpenny novels too, as full of matter as the ordinary six-shilling affair. The first is to be by Mr. Hornung.

And other novels?

Well, it is not a strong season for novels. The principal books that are promised are history, travel, and biography. Biography is very strong.

Tell me some of the books.

The Life and Letters of Sir John Millais, by his son; the Letters of Benjamin Jowett; another volume of the Memoirs of the Verney Family; another volume of Byron's Letters; the Life of George Borrow.

At last?

Yes; it is really coming. We shall have it at once, "before the swallow dares."

Go on.

The Life of William Morris, by Mr. Mackail; the Life of F. T. Palgrave; a study of Spinoza, by Sir Frederick Pollock; and two Lives of Danton.

Two?

Yes; for years and years Danton—Carlyle's Titan of the Revolution—has been passed over, and then in one month two Lives are sent forth.

Who write them?

One is by Mr. A. H. Beesly; the other by Mr. Belloc.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc?

Yes.

Will they put "By the author of The Bad Child's Book of Beasts" on the Danton's title-page?

No. Mr. Belloc has two distinctly pronounced sides. His Life of Danton represents the serious one. History is fairly strong, too. Among the new history books will be one on Alfred the Great, in connexion with the millenary.

I see that Dr. Conan Doyle votes for the deposition of St. George and the substitution of Alfred as our patron saint.

It is not likely to happen. In pictorial qualities the fight with the dragon is so infinitely superior to the accident with the cakes. Other history books are a new volume of Dr. Hodgkin's Invaders of Italy; a new volume of Prof. Flinders Petrie's History of Egypt; Oliver Cromwell and the Rule of the Puritans, by C. Firth; A Literary History of Ireland, by Dr. Douglas Hyde; Shakespeare in France, by M. Jusserand; A History of the Colonisation of Africa by Alien Races, by Sir H. H. Johnston; The Foundation of the German Empire, by J. W. Headlam; Mary Queen of Scots, by Mr. Rait; and a History of England in verse.

In verse?

Yes. Mr. Brinley Johnson has collected ballads and songs to cover a large number of important events.

What is there in the way of poetry?

Very little. The most important is Mr. W. B. Yeats's new volume, The Wind Among the Reeds. Then we are to have a complete edition of R. S. Hawker. And there are also Mr. Barry Pain's Tompkins Verses.

And fiction?

Another Crockett.

So I suppose.

A new H. G. Wells: When the Sleeper Wakes.

That's more exciting.

A new Howells. Some short stories by the author of Liza of Lambeth, called Daisy. A new book by Mr. E. H. Cooper. A study of a female dipsomaniac by Mrs. Atherton.

That's rather cheerful!

Yes, novelists can be cheerful when they like. Two studies of low life are promised in No. 5, John Street, by the author of The Island, and in Hooligan Nights. Dr. Conan Doyle has a new novel, A Duet; and his brother-in-law, Mr. Hornung, has a new novel, The Amateur Crackman.

And what about series?

Mr. Unwin, who founded the "Pseudonym" series, has ready a new series to be called the "Overseas Library." Mr. Cunningham Graham leads off with The Ipané, and other Sketches.

What is the scope?

The books will present as vividly as possible aspects of colonial life and life in far lands.

Are there other new series?

Messrs. Methuen have one, to be called "The Little Library." Books of all kinds will be included, in pocket form, each with an introduction. A Little Book of English Lyrics and Pride and Prejudice lead off.

More Jane Austen?

When in doubt every publisher plays Jane Austen. And why not? We can't have too much of a good thing.

"The Little Library" is a rival to the "Temple Classics," I suppose?

Yes, but the "Temple Classics" show no sign of abated vigour. De Quincey, Epictetus, Carlyle's Past and Present, Wordsworth's Sonnets, are all to be expected soon.

And what of travel?

Travel is not very strong. Mrs. Bishop's Yangtze Valley; Mr. Vivian's Tunisia and the Modern Barbary Pirates; Mr. T. A. Cook's Rouen; Mr. Stephen Gwynn's Highways and Byways of Donegal, Derry, and Antrim; and Miss Hannah Lynch's Toledo.

And now tell me about miscellaneous books. They are so often the best.

Not this spring, I think. But there are some interesting ones. The Etchingham Letters, from Cornhill, is promised, and Mr. Fuller-Maitland has told the story of his musical development. Mr. Dobson has a new volume of essays, A Paladin of Philanthropy. There is a comprehensive manual of Athletics, by a variety of experts; and another on golf—The Book of Golf and Golfers—edited by Mr. Horace Hutchinson. A new translation from the Swedish of Selma Lagerlöf, The Miracles of Anti-Christ, is about to appear. Several gardening books are in preparation, and the best edition of White's Selborne that has yet appeared is coming out in monthly parts.

And all these belong to the spring?

Yes.

And will more follow in the summer?

Many more.

But what about Nature?

O, Nature always wins in the end.

The Spring Publishing Season.

New Books and Announcements.

THE lists that follow comprise the principal new books and new editions belonging to the spring of 1899. It has been said that if anything is more interesting than books themselves it is their titles. In the conviction that this is true, we have permitted these titles to take possession of twelve columns of the ACADEMY.

KING ALFRED'S OLD ENGLISH VERSION of BOETHIUS DE CONSOLATIONE PHILOSOPHIAE. Edited from the MSS., with Introduction, Critical Notes, and Glossary, by WALTER JOHN SEDGEFIELD, M.A. Melbourne, B.A. Cantab.

In view of the approaching celebration of the Thousandth Anniversary of King Alfred's death, this edition of his most important work is opportune (the last edition was published thirty-five years ago), giving as it does for the first time the full text of the oldest MS. as far as its damaged state allows. It is hardly necessary to point out how important the Old English Boethius is for a right understanding of King Alfred's aspirations and his conception of the kingly ideal.

Royal 4to, 21 pages of Letterpress, with 46 Collotype Plates, half bound, 17s. 6d. net.

POPULAR NOVELS

BY FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

The Play entitled A LADY of QUALITY, which the Author has based on her two well-known Novels mentioned below, and which has been most favourably received in the United States, drawing large audiences, is now being performed at the Comedy Theatre, being first presented to the London public on the 8th of March, 1899.

NEW EDITIONS OF THE NOVELS ARE NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

FIFTEENTH THOUSAND.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

HIS GRACE of OSMONDE: being a Story of that Nobleman's Life omitted from the Narrative given to the World of Fashion under the title of "A Lady of Quality." By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

"His Grace of Osmonde" supplies the first instance within our knowledge in which a story has been deliberately told a second time from a different point of view by its author without losing any, or, at most, any more than a little of its primal interest and charm." Literature.

TWENTY-FIRST THOUSAND.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

A LADY of QUALITY: being a most Curious, hitherto unknown, History, as related by Mr. Isaac Bickerstaff, but not presented to the World of Fashion through the pages of "The Tatler," and now for the first time Written Down. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. Title-Page in Red and Black, with Vignette and Etched Frontispiece from Original Drawings by Lancelot Speed.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

HAWORTH'S. By Frances Hodgson BURNETT.

"A delightful novel, written with all the power and imagination of the gifted author."—Hertford Times.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THROUGH ONE ADMINISTRATION. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

"The book is full of good things. We cannot attempt to quote a tithe of them. In fact, we have not the space to quote at all. We long to describe the inauguration of the new Presidents, 'the liar, the forger, the thief; the model of virtue and probity, the soul of honour.' As a picture of Washington society, as we have seen it and known it, the book is as nearly perfect as may be."—Standard.

Small medium 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THAT LASS o' LOWRIE'S: a Lancashire Story. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. With Illustrations by F. Brangwyn.

"In 'That Lass o' Lowrie's' Mrs. Burnett has given us the most exquisite creation of a woman that has ever been in fiction."—Winter's Journal.

NOW READY, NEW EDITION.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 668 pp., 7s. 6d., containing 30,000 Quotations and a most complete Classified Index.

Dictionary of Quotations
From Ancient and Modern, English and Foreign Sources.

Including Phrases, Mottoes, Maxims, Proverbs, Definitions, Aphorisms, and Sayings of Wise Men, in their bearing on Life, Literature, Speculation, Science, Art, Religion, and Morals.

Selected and Compiled by the Rev. JAMES WOOD, Editor of "Nuttall's Standard Dictionary."

"Never before have materials so widespread been collated into a single volume, and the work has besides the unique distinction of including something like a representative collection of quotations from the modern writings which hitherto have hardly been laid under tribute for such a purpose at all." Liverpool Courier.

FAVOURITE FLOWERS OF GARDEN AND GREENHOUSE.

By EDWARD STEP, F.L.S.

The Cultural Directions Edited by WILLIAM WATSON, F.R.H.S., Assistant Curator of the Royal Gardens, Kew. Illustrated with 316 superb Coloured Plates, drawn and coloured with minute care direct from the actual living plants.

Opinions of the Press.

The ATHENÆUM of April 9, 1898, says:—"We have here a useful book of reference, and not a mere pretty book which conveys little or no information. We do not hesitate to commend it strongly to the notice of the amateur and lover of flowers."

The TIMES says:—

"Every one is interested in garden and greenhouse flowers, and the four handsome volumes entitled 'Favourite Flowers of Garden and Greenhouse' will find many patrons."

The STANDARD says:—

"The volumes are all alike in their interest. The pictures awaken many a pleasant memory of old times to those who have drifted into cities; they will be coveted by all and purchased by many."

The DAILY CHRONICLE says:—

"We wish that everybody who takes pride in his garden could afford a copy of this beautiful work. So much disappointment would be avoided, so much labour saved, and so much greater in proportion would be the results."

SERIES I. AND II.

In square fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt, round corners, 7s. 6d. each; and in morocco, 10s. 6d. each.

WAYSIDE AND WOODLAND BLOSSOMS.

LOUDON'S AMATEUR GARDENER:

A Guide as to what should be Done in a Garden in each Month of the Year.

Revised and Edited by W. ROBINSON, F.L.S.

AMATEUR GARDENING says:—

"The directions given are such as will be useful to those to whom gardening is a relaxation, after business fatigues, and the book is specially suited to the needs of the London garden lover, whose limited practical experience will be sufficiently supplemented, by this simple and handy guide, to tide him over the difficulties besetting the beginner and ensure to him the greater enjoyment of his hobby."

NOW READY, NEW EDITION.

488 Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, illustrated, 3s. 6d.

HERALDRY: Ancient and Modern.

Including BOLTTELL'S HERALDRY. Edited and Revised, with Additions, by S. T. AVELING.

In compliance with repeated demands, it has been decided to re-issue this well-known manual. The work gives an account of the origin and progress of Heraldry, from the earliest times to the present day, and describes, in a simple yet interesting manner, the significance of heraldic symbols, from the badge of the chieftain to the insignia of the orders of chivalry. The book is copiously illustrated, and describes coats of arms, crests, monograms, seals and their appendages, and contains a carefully compiled glossary.

POPULAR NOVELS.

Second Edition. Just published. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

JOHN GILBERT, YEOMAN: a Romance of the Commonwealth. By R. G. SOANS.

"This is a novel of high order, and we commend it to the reflecting literary community." Dublin Irish Times.

"The book would do no discredit even to the gifted hand of Stanley Weyman."—People.

"All lovers of a stirring historical novel should read this work."—York Gazette.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

THE HEPSWORTH MILLIONS.

By CHRISTIAN LYS.

"For a long railway journey, or as a companion on a wet day, we can confidently recommend 'The Hepsorth Millions.'"—Derby Mercury.

NEW VOLUME BY THE AUTHOR OF "SCARLET AND STEEL."

RED COAT ROMANCES. By E.

LIVINGSTON PRESCOTT. Illustrated by Richard Simpkin. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

"There is humour and character as well as a touch of quiet pathos in these seven tales of garrison life. Among the best of them are 'Corporal by Purchase,' 'Judgment by Default,' 'The Blue-Eyed Babe,' and 'Poor Little Jacky.' All of them have heart, all of them show an intimate knowledge of Tommy Atkins, and all are worthy to be read."—Daily Mail.

POPULAR RE-ISSUE OF

MR. MARSHALL MATHER'S WORKS.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. each.

LANCASHIRE IDYLLS. By

MARSHALL MATHER.

The Athenæum says: "The simplest story in the world, yet told with a force and delicacy that for the nonce raise into poetry the trivial and every-day incident."

THE SIGN of the WOODEN

SHOON. By MARSHALL MATHER.

The Bookman, in the Series of Articles on New Writers refers to "The Sign of the Wooden Shoon" as one "of the truest and most pathetic interpretations of the character of a locality which has been published." "The Sign of the Wooden Shoon" was not written to order, but because of a passion that was on him to speak for the folk whom he had learned to love."

Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, bevelled boards, 3s. 6d. each.

THE SHUTTLE of FATE. By

C. MASTERS. With Original Illustrations by Lancelot Speed.

THE DUCHESS LASS. By

C. MASTERS, Author of "The Shuttle of Fate." With Original Illustrations by Lancelot Speed.

THE WORLD'S COARSE THUMB.

A HISTORY OF BRITISH INDIA.

By Sir WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER, K.C.S.I., M.A., LL.D.,

A Vice-President of the Royal Asiatic Society.

"Every page of the volume speaks of diligent research. Everywhere presides a sober, calm judgment. A fascinating story of prowess and skill....told with great clearness and vividness, and with a wealth of incident which the adventure-novelist must envy."—The Times.

"It changes the popular perspective. With the historic sense—which is as rare as the poetic sense—our author is gifted in an exceptional degree. His history, if it fulfils the promise of its beginning, will prove to be the British Indian history which has never yet been written, and which we have been waiting for."—Daily News.

The Unknown Kipling.

MR. KIPLING's illness brought his name before the huge non-reading public, to whom he is a stranger. Every newspaper, from the Times, which printed the bulletins of his health on its leader page, down to the chameleon evening prints, helped to satisfy one part of the nation and puzzle another. For while some readers were recalling Mr. Kipling's life, his acts and words, others, less enlightened, were asking, "Who is Mr. Kipling?"

A representative of the ACADEMY has been making inquiries among people whose degree of acquaintance with Mr. Kipling's work seemed worth ascertaining. The following utterances are the result and it is only necessary to add that each is given as it fell from the lips of the speaker, without any element of invention.

A 'BUS RIVER.

Arstin' you a question, sir, 'oo is this Mr. Kilping?

A TOBACCONIST.

Yes, sir, he's one of the greatest. All the same, I can't say that I ever heard of Mr. Kipling till he had pneumonia.

A FRUITERER.

Mr. Kipling! Aye, aye; it's nice weather for sick folks. He's an American, isn't he, sir?

A MAN SERVANT.

A great loss, sir, I'm sure. And so sudden, they tell me. No, I don't read the papers much; I only know what they tell me. And his secretary in the next room, they tell me.

A CABMAN.

"Like to see he Star?" I said as I alighted. "Kipling's all right." The cabman's face glowed with interest as he leaned down for the crumpled paper. "I don't seem to know the party," he said.

A POLISH WAITER.

Yes, ver' glad Mister Keepling better. O yes, I haf read some of dem—yes, yes, they ver' good—pot Sienkiewicz, he is ze man. Haf you read him?—no?—ach! He is ze man.

A CHARWOMAN.

No, sir, I never read his books; a bit o' Lloyd's on a Sunday afternoon's all I seems to get time for. Suppose he's a grand writer. I asked my brother had he read any of his pieces—said he had.

A BARBER.

Yessir; papers seem to think he'll get over it. No, sir; can't say I'm a great book reader. Happen to know when the organ-grinder's case comes on, sir?—there's a romance, sir—I hope that ain't goin' to drop.

A CHEESEMONOER.

Quite the sensation, sir; wonder if they'd make the same fuss if I had the pneumonia—ha! ha!

A CLUB PORTER.

Sing'ler how pore old Lord 'Erschell—skatin'—pore old man—fell and hurt hisself—and just before he expired telegraphed to this young writin' feller—what's his name?—Kipling?

A SOLDIER.

No; I hardly think they read his books, but they ought to. Not the privates, at least. Maybe in the sergeants' mess and among the officers. You see, a young soldier hasn't the time. It's only seven years, and he's a lot to do, and he likes goin' about London. I dessay on foreign stations they read his books; but not here, unless it's a song, and then, maybe, they wouldn't ever ask who wrote it. Yes, I've read a bit. Mulvaney?—no, not that. I know I read something once. Glad he's getting on? Aye, you may believe that, sir. My only fear is—when he knows about his little gel.

A POL EMAN.

It was at the Islington Horse Show. I sidled up to the policeman who was guarding the emergency exit to the ring. "They've been making a great fuss over this Rudyard Kipling. Have you read any of his stories?" "Oh, yes! I've read them." "Do you suppose he invented them, or are they?" "All true," he broke in. "I was in the Navy myself. Better job than this." Just then there was a commotion in the ring, as a gentleman entered from beneath the Royal box. "That's the Duke of Edinburgh," he said; "see him?" I suggested that he looked more like the Duke of York. "Well, I knew the Duke of Edinburgh in the Navy. Talk about a stickler. Why, at court-martial he couldn't sentence a man out of his own 'ed, like the other captains. He had to do it from books."

"And Mr. Kipling's books are read in the Navy?" I asked. "Oh, yes! they read him in the Navy. When I was in the Navy the Duke of Edinburgh would 'ave it that our flannel shirts must look white on parade. You know what it means to keep flannel white after washing in salt water. Well, do you know what we did? We pinned on a flannel dicky. Larf, why—" "So you really think Mr. Kipling's stories are not invented?" I interposed. The light of reminiscence died from his eyes. "Oh, no! all true," he said. "The public reads him. All true."

Froude to Thoreau.

A Still-Born Book.

Some Unpublished Letters of Henry D. and Sophia E. Thoreau: a Chapter in the History of a Still-Born Book is the title of a handsomely-printed volume of which a small edition (150 copies) has just been issued by the Marion Press, Jamaica, Queensborough, New York, under the editorship of Dr. Samuel A. Jones, who by his bibliography and other services has earned the gratitude of Thoreau students. The "still-born book" is the first edition of the now famous Week on the Concord River, the bulk of which, some 700 copies, were returned by the publisher as unsaleable, and were stacked by Thoreau in the attic of his father's house at Concord, as described by him in a characteristic passage: "I have now a library of nearly nine hundred volumes, over seven hundred of which I wrote myself." A copy of this edition, as Dr. Jones tells us, "now finds warm welcome to the selectest of private libraries at eighteen dollars."

It was a desire to obtain a copy of the despised and rejected Week that brought a Michigan reader into correspondence with Thoreau in 1856; and it is Thoreau's letters to this western admirer that are now printed for the first time, set in the framework of a racy editorial comment which, unlike most efforts of that sort, greatly enhances the effect. The letters, which are six in number, and date from 1856 to 1859, are of no special significance, but throw an interesting side-light on the character of the writer—the indomitable spirit of simplicity and self-reliance that speaks through all his works. Here is a brief sentence: "I should consider it a greater success to interest one wise and earnest soul than a million unwise and frivolous."

Dr. Jones's volume is mainly of the esoteric order, and appeals rather to the special class of Thoreau students than to the general reader; it contains, however, one hitherto unpublished letter from Froude to Thoreau which is of wider interest. It appears that Thoreau, who was known to Froude through Emerson, had sent him a copy of the Week, in acknowledgment of which the author of The Nemesis of Faith, then lately published, replied as follows:

Manchester, September 3, 1849.

DEAR MR. THOREAU,—I have long intended to write to you, to thank you for that noble expression of yourself you were good enough to send me. I know not why I have not done so, except from a foolish sense that I should not write until I had thought of something to say that it should be worth your while to read. What can I say to you except express the honour and the love I feel for you—au honour and a love which Emerson taught me long ago to feel, but which I feel now "not on account of his word, but because I myself have read and know you."

When I think of what you are—of what you have done as well as what you have written—I have the right to tell you that there is no man living upon this earth at present whose friendship or whose notice I value more than yours.

What are these words! Yet I wished to say something—and I must use words, though they serve but seldom in these days for much but lies.

In your book and in one other from your side of the Atlantic, Margaret, I see hope for the coming world; all else which I have found true in any of our thinkers (or even yours) is their flat denial of what is false in the modern popular jargon; but for their positive affirming side they do but fling us back upon our own human nature to hold on by that with our own strength. A few men here and there do this, as the later Romans did; but mankind cannot, and I have gone near to despair. I am growing not to despair, and I thank you for a helping hand.

Well, I must see you some time or other. It is not such a great matter with these steam bridges. I wish to shake hands with you and look a brave man in the face. In the meantime I will but congratulate you on the age in which your work is cast: the world has never seen one more pregnant. God bless you!—Your friend (if you will let him call you so),

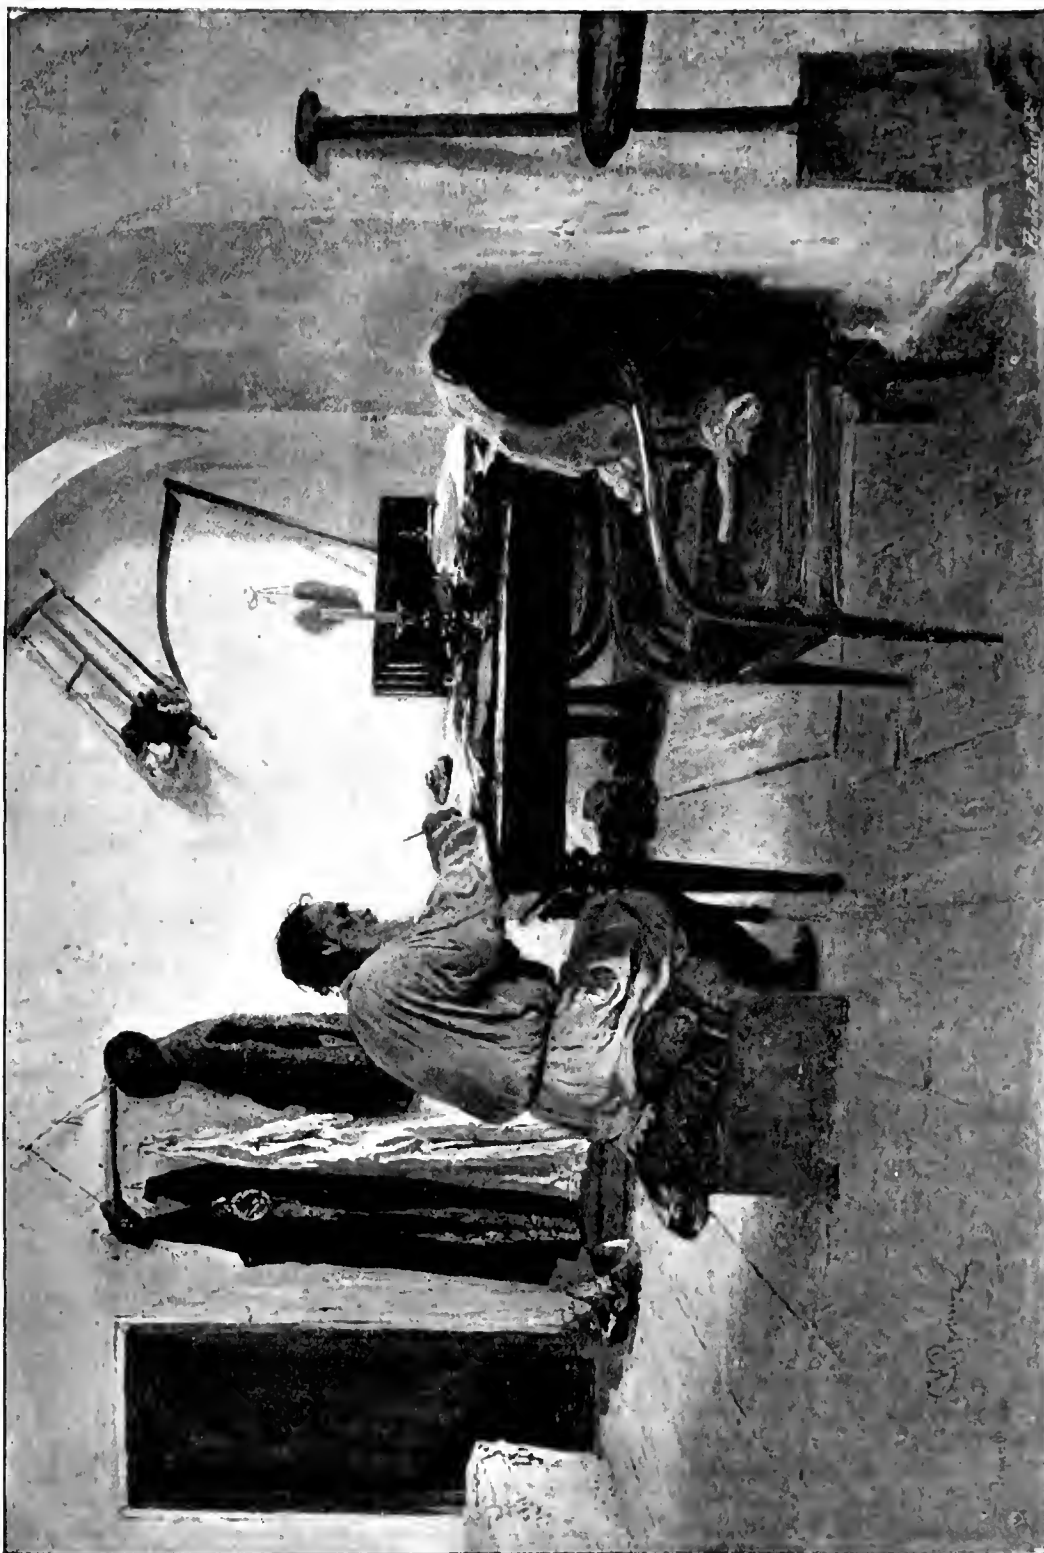

J. A. FROUDE.

Other interesting matter is to be found in the book—an entertaining glimpse, for example, of the whimsical Ellery Channing, easily recognised under the mask of "X. Y. Z." The true and tender nature of Sophia Thoreau is shown from her letters; and the Appendix preserves a valuable record of "Two Visits to Concord, from an Old Diary" (presumably that of Thoreau's Michigan correspondent), which gives a picture of Thoreau-land as seen, after the master's death, by one of the earliest of its pilgrims. Of Thoreau's literary circle there will soon remain but a memory. Both Harrison Blake and Daniel Ricketson—the "Mr. B." and "Mr. D. R." of the Letters—have recently died, and Ellery Channing, still living in Concord at an advanced age, is now the sole survivor of Thoreau's compeers.

HENRY S. SALT.

Tolstoi's New Book.

SOME very interesting particulars concerning Tolstoi's new novel are supplied to us by Mr. Walter Scott. The title is Resurrection, and the book will appear weekly and simultaneously in Russia and other European countries, beginning on March 25 and ending probably about September 2. In America it will appear monthly, beginning April 1, and the arrangements there are such as to prevent serial publication in that continent prejudicing publication elsewhere. About 100,000 words long, the novel will consist of about eighty chapters. Each weekly part will therefore consist of three or four chapters. It may be mentioned that in Russia, although the version published there will be mutilated by the censors and cut down by at least one-third of the length of the work, the serial rights have fetched about £1,300. In America the serial rights of the authorised English version have been sold for 5,000 dollars, and the opportunity of publishing immediately on completion of serial, but without copyright, has realised 4,100 dollars. In France about £500 is being paid for serial rights. So much for other countries. In England, however, a novel plan is to be adopted. No copyright is to be taken out, but all papers that care to print the story serially have the opportunity of doing so by payment to Mr. Walter Scott of the sum of £20. Then, on the day of completion of the serial publications, Resurrection will be issued in book form in the only authorised edition. In this edition will appear the illustrations, made by Prof. Pasternak, of Moscow, after consultation with the author. Newspapers wishing for these illustrations can have them by an extra payment. All the profits on the novel are, by the author's wish, to go to assist in the emigration to Canada, and colonisation there, of the Dukhoborts, the Russian sect who, for the crime of refusing to bear arms, have been cruelly prosecuted, but are now being permitted to leave Russia. Resurrection, we are told, besides presenting a vivid picture of contemporary Russian life, is a work of great dramatic power and interest, touching incidentally on several of the most pressing latter-day problems, and, so far as literary and artistic treatment is concerned, is likely to enhance even the fame which Anna Karénina brought to the author.

Tolstoi at Home.

Things Seen.

Capitulation.

ROBERT had been away four years in Paris and in London. When he came back to Dumbartonshire he was changed—to grandmother most of all.

But she took no notice, for she had loved Robert best of all from that first day when his Republican grandfather left the little crop-headed orphan boy to be brought up in his Scotch grandmother's home, by his dead mother's wish.

She listened and waited—till one day. The wind was howling round the grey old house. The weather had been wretched for a week, and Robert was bored and something sharp-edged as to temper. He sat by the fire discoursing of what were, to us, new philosophies. He touched on the iniquity of existing marriage laws and the inartistic exigencies of the Decalogue generally, explaining that although self-development is confessedly but a succession of suicides, it is the only form of evolution to be sought after and worked out, regardless of everything else.

Pretty Elspeth gazed and wondered; grave Margit shook her head; Geordie, his huge hand covering his mouth, smiled with his eyes at what he would call "Robert's French havers." Only grandmother spoke: from time to time exclaiming, "Indeed! is that the case? Dear me, dear me!" in a voice that might have been ironical but for the expression of candid innocence on her face.

Presently he began to speak of "existing creeds" and of their "outworn" character. For a brief space no one interrupted him.

Suddenly grandmother leant forward in her chair. "Laddie!" she thundered, "if I thocht ye believed one half o' what ye have been saying this day, I'd skelp ye till ye couldna' sit."

Robert sprang up and made as though to leave the room: half-way to the door he paused, and turning, went and kneeled down by grandmother's chair. He took her hand, beautiful still in spite of her eighty years, and kissed it, saying gently, "You would be quite justified."

She took hold of his chin and turned up his face towards her, and they looked into each other's eyes.

"Puir laddie," she whispered, and he laid his head down on her knee.

Emptiness.

SHE was a young and thin and weary mother. Her child lay heavily on her lap as the omnibus rumbled along. Suddenly the infant awoke and cried, and she put the tube of the feeding bottle in its mouth. For a moment there was a grateful peace, but as suddenly as it came it went in a yell of anger and disappointment. The mother again proffered the time-honoured consolation, and for a second or two there was a gurgling calm, only, however, to be broken by a more energetic explosion than before. The mother repeated the operation, but with increasingly indignant manifestations till she discovered that the feeding tube had parted from the bottle! The child had been having its first taste of the emptiness of life.

Memoirs of the Moment.

BOOKS will no doubt be written some day or other on the religion of Kipling, as books have been written already on the religion of Shakespeare, of Browning, of Tennyson. Not even Mr. Swinburne shall escape creed-classification, seeing that he has already read in a newspaper a defence of his Christianity—which need mean no more than that its writer admires Mr. Swinburne's verse and is himself a Christian. Whatever may be said of Mr. Kipling—and there are ingenious people arguing the point of Paganism versus Christianity already—we have the undoubted fact that he had two grandfathers who were Methodist ministers, the Rev. Joseph Kipling and the Rev. G. B. Macdonald.

A GREAT authority once said that the atmosphere of the House of Lords suggested quotations from Paradise Lost, and the atmosphere of the House of Commons quotations from Childe Harold. But now neither Milton nor Byron is quoted—only Kipling. There is a tradition among politicians that poetry should not be quoted, except, perhaps, it be a Latin line; to care for contemporary poetry has always been to incur a sneer against your practicality. But Kipling has removed the reproach; and even the Viceroy of India, whom all his friends have been warning against being "too literary" in his allusions, could not resist quoting in Calcutta the other day a verse from the pen of the "Anglo-Indian." The illness of Mr. Kipling, by the way, has not only shown how full the world is of his readers, but it has vastly added to the number. By the Emperor's telegram Germany has been made alert to translate and read him; and one of the last orders for his Barrack Room Ballads was sent to England from—the Vatican. "But who is Mr. Kipling?" asked the Pope one morning when their names were headed together in a French paper. He was told by Monsignor Merry del Val, himself half an Englishman; and Thomas Atkins makes in consequence his peaceful and literary entry into the palace of the Vatican.

THE Count of Turin has made a new friend in an Englishman, Sir Henry Tichborne, once the little boy for whom the great case against the Claimant was fought. The Count and Sir Henry are shooting together in India.

THE mutability of human fortunes is nowhere written plainer than on the great houses of London, to which were proudly given the names of their founders or of families that were their former occupants. "We were" is the unseen writing upon these once boastful walls. Hardly one such house is now inhabited according to its label—not Bute House, not Marlborough House (though the present Duke of Marlborough will no doubt try to restore it to his family when the Prince of Wales moves to Buckingham Palace); not Chesterfield House, now Lord Burton's; not Cambridge House, which the present Duke of Cambridge, whose father lived in it, can still frequent, but only as a clubman; not Lansdowne House till lately. These titles have become confusing, yet to change them with each fresh owner would be to invite attention to transfers of wealth, or other vicissitudes, in succeeding generations. Dudley House—to name another—must be Dudley House still, not Robinson House, though Lord Dudley lives elsewhere in London, and long ago sold his family mansion to Mr. Robinson, who, by the way, is just returning thither with his wife after an absence of two years.

MR. ZANGWILL, who reached Liverpool last Saturday morning, and is now in his native London, has much to say, and will publicly say some of it, on his visit to the United States. Mr. Zangwill finds it difficult to tear himself away from ports, especially from sea-ports. He loves shipping, with which he has made close acquaintance during long residence at Plymouth and Bristol; and he was almost reluctant to leave the Campania the other day, even after a rather troublous crossing.

MR. JOHN LANE, who leaves London to-day for the United States, will shortly return to occupy a house he has bought in Kensington Gardens-terrace.

THE Duchess of Sutherland has completed a novel which her friends pronounce to be "socialistic."

MR. FORBES ROBERTSON may very probably appear as Morrice Buekler in the play Mr. Mason is making (with Mr. Comyns Carr's assistance) from his Anglo-Indian story. But the appearance of Mr. Robertson as Sir Willoughby Patterne has been quite indefinitely postponed.
